Mr. DOCKERY. Is the bill approved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is.

Mr. DOCKERY. Unanimously?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Unanimously.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did that committee seek any information from the War Department?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I am not here to answer for the committee. I can not tell what they did in the matter.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, if I caught the reading of that bill correctly, it seeks to make available not only this appropriation particularly, but any appropriation and all appropriations for this purpose.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. No. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he misapprehended the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLUE. I would like to have that bill read in my own time to see what it does seek to accomplish.

The bill was again read.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The gentleman will observe that the bill refers to appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. BLUE. That is precisely the objection that I have made. It includes all of the appropriations. It might reach not only the $12,000 suggested by the gentleman from New York as being made last year, but any other appropriation heretofore made.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If the gentleman from Kansas will permit me, I will say, for his information, that there is only one appropriation heretofore made and unexpended for this improvement, and that is the $12,000 made last year.

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman from New York is certain of that, it would be a good explanation, of course.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I will say again that the "gentleman from New York" is certain; that improvement is in his own town and adjoining city, where he has resided for a number of years, and he knows all about it.

Mr. BLUE. I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I desire to give my approval to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] with reference to this method of legislation. I regard it as very objectionable. Here is an appropriation made by the recent river and harbor bill, and this bill now pending seeks to set aside that appropriation—to divert it, to change its character to a certain extent as to the work to be done. If this is to be tolerated, and especially when it appears that it has not been submitted to the proper authority for approval, it seems to me that we are opening the door to very much vicious legislation in that direction. This bill itself may be all right. I know nothing to the contrary. But it is bad policy, in my judgment, and it is a precedent that we ought not to establish. Therefore I think it ought not to pass.

Mr. CANNON. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. This is a new survey, I believe, upon which the gentleman seeks to apply, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, an appropriation already made. Now, what is the work to cost under the new survey when it is completed?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I will say that I am not able to answer that question in figures, but I can make a statement in regard to the work which I think will not only satisfy the gentleman from Illinois, but also the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] as well.

Mr. CANNON. What I wished to know was whether or not we are in a great scheme, because they come quite often enough in passing river and harbor bills, but whether, on a single scheme, where we are not embarrassed by "log rolling," we are not entering upon an exceedingly large expenditure without exactly knowing what we are doing.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I would like to answer the gentleman from Illinois in this way: The Hutcheson River, or, as it is officially named in the report of the Chief of Engineers, Eastchester Creek, is a river emptying into Pelham Bay and Long Island Sound just to the south of the city of Mount Vernon, in Westchester County, N. Y. The improvements heretofore made in Hutcheson River have carried an improved channel up to just the southerly boundary of the city of Mount Vernon, or the northerly boundary of the city of New York. The character of the improvement, so far as it has been carried on, has been dredging through marshy lands, without rock or other obstructions, and is the simplest and cheapest kind of work of this character; and the improvement, so far as completed, reaches within about 2,000 feet, or possibly less, of the main highway of the city of Mount Vernon, and only to the southerly portion of the city of Mount Vernon.

Now, if this bill is not passed, the $12,000 heretofore appropriated would be expended in further dredging the channel below the northerly portion of the present improvement, where it is not so necessary, because the channel there is now sufficient for traffic, although it is not in the very best condition, whereas if the improvement be extended the additional 2,000 feet it would make a safe and suitable channel along the whole line of the improvement, reaching up to a main highway of the city of Mount Vernon.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman know what the additional survey is estimated to cost?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not know whether it is $10,000 or $50,000?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I do not suppose the additional work will cost to exceed $5,000, and I make that statement with some personal knowledge and experience of the conditions existing, and of the cost of such work.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will my friend allow me one other question? Is this a river and harbor improvement for navigation, or is it an improvement that is merely local to the town of Mount Vernon to give them drainage, or something of that kind, at the expense of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is a river and harbor improvement for the purpose of navigation, and will bring building material and other material used in the city, by this route, to a population of about 35,000 people, including the 20,000 in Mount Vernon and the additional population to the east.

Mount Vernon not only at present contains a population of 20,000, but its growth has been, is, and promises to be unprecedented and wonderful. Within a few years it has developed from a village of about 9,000 to the present city of 20,000 population. Located at the northerly border of New York City, at the first station on the New Haven Railroad from the Grand Central Depot, and with the rapid-transit service of the Harlem Railroad and an electric railway to the city of New York, giving additional facilities to the commuters, situated upon high and undulating ground in a section made historical by the Revolutionary armies, and itself having a history connected with the name of Horace Greeley, one of its founders, with well-paved avenues made beautiful by perfect arbors of trees whose overhanging branches meet, this city has attracted some of the best of New York City's population, and has lacked only in the disadvantage of being an inland city, with the consequent greater cost of building and other materials. The harbor improvements completed have already attracted a line of freight steamers in competition with the higher rates of the railways, and the improvements now under way and contemplated by this bill will make Mount Vernon an important seaboard town.

Mr. CANNON. You have got it now within 1,500 feet of where you propose to extend it.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. We have got it now at the southerly point of Mount Vernon, at a locality requiring a longer haul to the rapidly growing portion of the city, and in part reached by going through private land, whereas this additional improvement will bring it to a main highway of the locality.

Mr. CANNON. Does the additional improvement look to the condemnation of land by the United States?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It does not, and I can say of my own knowledge that so far as the straightening of the stream is concerned, in accordance with the surveys which have been made, the land through which it goes will be given to the United States in exactly the same manner as was done in straightening the stream below.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question? If I understand correctly, the chief purpose of this legislation is to change the course of the stream that is to be improved, applying the $12,000 above the point to which it would apply under the general bill. Am I correct about that?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. You are correct. I would state this——

Mr. BLUE. Let me ask you another question. By diverting this $12,000 to another place, it will leave the improvement below that point, as you say, in a rather unsatisfactory condition, will it not, under the general appropriation made by the bill heretofore passed for the purpose of deepening and improving that part of the stream?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. No, I did not say that; and the answer that I was about to make to the gentleman's first question will answer both questions. The appropriations that have heretofore been expended have improved that channel to the point to which it has been improved, to a certain depth. So far as that depth is concerned, it is entirely completed, so that it is used for navigation by the steamers coming up to the dock at that point. This appropriation, if not expended for the purpose of continuing that channel at the same depth for this additional 1,500 to 2,000 feet, to the main highway, would simply be expended in deepening still further a portion of the channel that has already been deepened.

Mr. STEELE. If you are certain that this land will be given to the Government, why do you not make it a provision in this bill that it shall be given?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. That would be unobjectionable; but I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that this whole matter is referred by the bill to the discretion of the Secretary of War, so that if in his discretion it would be more economical and advisable in this coming year to expend a portion of the money on this additional portion of the improvement instead of on the old portion of the work, then, and only then, it shall be done.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why did you not take the opinion of the Chief of Engineers on this bill?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The bill itself leaves it entirely discretionary with the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, who will have to be communicated with before this additional work is done. I will say further that the moment it was communicated to me that the surveys had been completed, owing to the short time remaining in this short session, the bill was immediately drafted and the matter submitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add only a word. This bill is in perfect harmony with the policy which seems to have received the approval of this House for the last two years, and that is to utterly ignore the fact that we have a Chief of Engineers whose recommendations ought to be considered in connection with river and harbor works.

In the last river and harbor bill there were items appropriating $1,453,000 against which this officer had reported as being absolutely unworthy. There were $10,696,000 of items in that bill on which the Chief of Engineers had made no report whatever.

Now, then, I suggest that the time has come when this House and when Congress ought to call a halt on this line of legislation. It may be that in the $10,696,000 carried in the last river and harbor bill those projects were among the most worthy. The fact remains, however, that there was no opinion expressed by the Chief of Engineers either for or against them. It is, however, known that there was $1,453,000 carried in the bill for items which the Chief of Engineers had declared to be unworthy.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a public announcement, because of the fact that at the last session of Congress gentlemen came in here with repeated resolutions calling upon the Secretary of War for estimates of cost in respect to certain public works. At the time I did not comprehend the full significance of those resolutions. I want to give notice to gentlemen now that if like resolutions are to be offered in the future, and unanimous consent asked for their consideration, they must carry with them a request that the Secretary of War report on the proposed projects as to their worthiness or unworthiness.

Now, as to this particular bill, it seems to be a small matter—only $12,000 involved. I am not sure whether it inaugurates a work that involves large expenditures by the Treasury. I know nothing of that. The gentleman in charge of the bill is no doubt entirely sincere in his statement that it does not, but I do think that the Chief of Engineers is entitled to respectful treatment from this House, which should call upon him for a report upon the merits of this bill.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if it is any disrespect to the Chief of Engineers to refuse to ask his consent to accord him permission to do as he pleases?

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, it may not be discourtesy, but it is much more satisfactory to the House to have his opinion upon the matter before we are called upon to legislate. That is what he is there for. He is paid a salary to pass upon this and other like questions, and it seems to me that it is an oversight on the part of the gentleman in charge of the bill not to have called upon the Chief of Engineers for his opinion in respect to the legislation.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 15.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

ALBERT AUGUSTINE.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 1021) granting relief to the heirs of Albert Augustine for property taken for the Cayuse war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $350, to be paid to the heirs of Albert Augustine, of Rose Hill, Iowa, for property taken for use of the United States Army in the Cayuse war, in 1847 and 1848.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MILNES. I ask for a second.

Mr. LACEY. I ask that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think a word or two in explanation would be satisfactory to the House. In the Cayuse war possession was taken of cattle, ox teams, horses, cows, and other animals to be used in that war. A commission was appointed immediately after the war to take a list of the property thus taken, and to report it for payment to the Secretary of War. This particular claim was not presented until after the discharge of the commission, when the commission's time expired, and this old man failed to get his claim presented in time. It has been hanging ever since. The claim was an old one, and it is a small one.

Mr. MILNES. How long was the commission in existence?

Mr. LACEY. For several years. This man came back to Iowa, but he was unaware of the existence of the commission until it had expired by limitation. The case is simply this: They took his ox teams, six or eight yoke of cattle, and his cows, and killed them and fed them to the soldiers. The matter has been investigated by the committee and evidence has been furnished of the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. How long ago was this?

Mr. LACEY. This was in the Cayuse war.

Mr. PAYNE. When was the Cayuse war? [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this is not a fit occasion for enlightening the gentleman as to the history of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Was it before 1847?

Mr. LACEY. It was about 1847–48; it was an Indian war.

Mr. PAYNE. Fifty years ago.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the amount involved?

Mr. LACEY. Three hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. DOCKERY. Too small.

Mr. LACEY. Yes, it is small.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendment as read.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 4.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PATENTING OF PETROLEUM LANDS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk, H. R. 9983, to authorize the entry and patenting of lands containing petroleum and other mineral oils under the placer-mining laws of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person authorized to enter lands under the mining laws of the United States may enter and obtain patent to lands containing petroleum or other mineral oils, and chiefly valuable therefor, under the provisions of the laws relating to placer mineral claims: Provided, That lands containing such petroleum or other mineral oils which have heretofore been filed upon, claimed, or improved as mineral, but not yet patented, may be held and patented under the provisions of this act the same as if such filing, claim, or improvement were subsequent to the date of the passage hereof.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I trust the gentleman from Wyoming will explain this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read in explanation of the bill.

The report (by Mr. MEIKLEJOHN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, having had under consideration House bill 9983, report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Public lands containing petroleum and other mineral oils have been held and patented under the placer-mining acts of the United States for many years past. In 1 Land Decisions, page 560, Mr. TELLER, then Secretary of the Interior, said that minerals so found "subjected the tract to the operation of the mining laws, as has been held under other rulings with respect to * * * petroleum * * * and other substances under like conditions."

The first patent issued by the Government under the placer-mining acts for lands containing petroleum was in the Los Angeles district, in California, mineral entry No. 18, March 22, 1880. Other entries have been made and patents issued since that time on lands containing petroleum in several of the public-land States, notably in the States of California and Wyoming.

The first ruling in the matter was that contained in the letter of instructions written by Commissioner Burdett to the United States surveyor-general of California, January 30, 1875, and was to the effect that petroleum-bearing lands were enterable under the mineral-land laws. (Copp's Land Owner, volume 1, page 179; Copp's Mineral Lands, second edition, page 160.) Another letter to the same effect was written by Commissioner McFarland, March 31, 1882. (Copp's Land Owner, volume 9, page 51.) Under these rulings and in view of the uniform practice of the Land Department for many years, considerable quantities of lands have been filed upon, held, and improved for the purpose of developing oils in various of the public-land States, and in many instances large sums of money have been expended in such development.

Under a decision of the Secretary of the Interior, dated August 27, 1896, in the case of mineral entry No. 140, Los Angeles district, California, the Secretary held that lands containing oils could not be patented under the placer-mining acts, for the reason that the acts did not originally contemplate the extension of their provisions to lands of this character. It has never been held by any authority that the provisions of the placer acts were not adequate to meet the conditions surrounding the development of mineral oils. The effect of the above-cited decision of August 27, 1896, is to preclude the possibility of obtaining title to lands containing oils, and as there are large areas of such lands in various of the public-land States, and as upon these lands in many instances large expenditures have already been made, and as it is manifestly for the public good that there should be some provision whereby these lands may be held and patented, the committee believe this bill should pass.

The honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office, to whom the bill was referred, states that there is urgent necessity for some legislation on this subject, and in this view the Secretary of the Interior concurs. The bill simply provides by legislation for procedure in the entry and patenting of these lands along the lines that have been pursued in the past under the decisions of the General Land Office, so that there is no departure whatever from the procedure in the past for the development and acquirement of such properties.

While it is quite probable, as recited by the honorable Secretary of the Interior in his decision of August 27, 1896, the provisions of the placer acts were not originally intended to extend to lands containing mineral oils, the legislators at that time, possibly, having in mind only metalliferous minerals, and the existence of petroleums on the public lands being at that time not generally known, it is nevertheless true that the provisions of these acts are calculated to aid in the development and purchase of lands of this character, and their provisions having been extended to such lands in the past, under rulings of the Department well understood, it is entirely proper that the provisions of these acts shall now be extended so as to embrace oil-bearing lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill extends the provisions of the placer-mining law to oil-bearing lands as, until last August, they had been applied for seventeen years under the order of the Department.

Mr. STEELE. This bill is intended to change the rule, is it?

Mr. MONDELL. They made a new ruling last August, and this bill is for the purpose of returning to the rule which prevailed for seventeen years previous to that time. During all that period the Department held that the provisions of the placer-mining act were applicable to these oil lands, but they changed that rule last August.

Mr. LACEY. Let me say to the gentleman that at present there is no method provided by law for acquiring title to oil lands; but, by a construction of the Department, the placer-mining act was held to be applicable to such lands up to a recent period, when the rule was changed by the Department.

Mr. STEELE. The mining of oil is a very expensive operation.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly. The work is done by boring and drilling, but the principles applying to the acquisition of title to such lands are the same as those involved in the placer-mining law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand it, the purpose of this bill is simply to extend to oil lands the same laws that apply now to mineral lands.

Mr. LACEY. No; it is to apply the provisions of the placer-mining law to the acquisition of title to public lands where they are valuable for oil. There being no method pointed out by the statute, the Department adopted that method and followed it for a great many years, but now they have changed the rule.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What are the provisions of the placer act?

Mr. MONDELL. It would take some time to state them in full, but I will say to the gentleman that for seventeen years these mineral-oil lands were held and patented under the provisions of the placer-mining law. Then the Commissioner decided that the original intent of that law was not that it should apply to lands of this character and that there ought to be legislation on the subject; not that the law was not adequate and applicable in itself to this character of land, but that the original intent was not to extend it to such lands and that there ought to be legislation. This bill was drawn to meet that difficulty, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office has approved it.

Mr. STEELE. Does it apply only to public lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Will this bill, if passed, be a benefit to the development of oil lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the ruling of last August there is no way by which we can obtain title to oil lands in the West, and this bill is intended to prescribe a way; and it prescribes the same procedure under which the business was done for years, until the Department changed its ruling.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In other words, I understand the gentleman to say that there is no method by which to-day a person can acquire title to Government lands containing petroleum.

Mr. MONDELL. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Can he not buy it?

Mr. MONDELL. Not since last August.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 3551), which is exactly the same, be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The rules were then suspended and the Senate bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6215) to increase the pension of Ambrose D. Manion.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations on public space in the city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1897, etc., with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6750) to authorize the mayor and city council of Monroe and the police jury of the parish of Ouachita, La., to construct a traffic bridge across the Ouachita River opposite said city;

A bill (H. R. 1256) for the relief of Henry A. Webb; and

A bill (H. R. 2859) granting a pension to Harriet F. Herrick.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands, the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1624) to quiet title and possession with respect to certain unconfirmed and located private land claims in the State of Louisiana.

Be it enacted, etc., That all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the lands situate in the State of Louisiana, known as the located but unconfirmed private land claims therein, aggregating about 80,000 acres, and specifically described in the list or tabular statement accompanying report, dated February 19, 1880, made by the surveyor-general of Louisiana to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under a resolution of the United States Senate of December 2, 1879, and which report and list were communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior on March 8, 1880, as Senate Executive Document No. 111, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, shall be, and the same are hereby, directed to be granted, released, and relinquished by the United States in fee simple, to the respective owners of the equitable titles thereto, and to their respective heirs and assigns forever, as fully and completely, in every respect whatever, as could be done by patents issued therefor according to law.

SEC. 2. That nothing contained in this act shall in any manner abridge, divest, impair, injure, or prejudice any valid right, title, or interest of any person or persons in or to any portion or part of the lands mentioned in said first section, the true intent of this act being to relinquish and abandon, grant, give, and concede any and all right, interest, and estate, in law or equity, which the United States is or is supposed to be entitled to in said lands in favor of all persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of the same under the laws of Louisiana, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of the said interest and estate of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the Department of the Interior shall cause patents to issue for such lands, and such patents shall issue in the name of the original claimant as appears in the list or schedule aforesaid, and when issued shall be held to be for the use and benefit of the true and lawful owners, as provided in sections 1 and 2 of this act.

Mr. LACEY. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There being no objection, the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

[Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The question being taken, the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PIER-HEAD LIGHT, SOUTH MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. OTJEN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 733) authorizing the establishment of a pier-head light at or near South Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish a pier-head light at or near South Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, at a cost not to exceed $5,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. OTJEN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There being no objection, the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What will be the expense of this work?

Mr. OTJEN. This bill provides no appropriation at all, but allows the establishment of the light station at a cost not exceeding $5,000.

This bill has passed the Senate, is recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I have a letter from the Light-House Board saying that it is urgently necessary.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let that letter be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, January 27, 1897.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request for further statement as to the necessity for the proposed South Milwaukee light station, Wisconsin, which is recommended in the estimates recently submitted to Congress, the board has the honor to state that in compiling the estimates for new works only those were included which the board decided after careful investigation were urgently required by the demands of commerce in the various districts. These new works thus determined upon were arranged for each district as nearly as practicable in the order of their necessity. It will be noted that of the six new "fixed aids" recommended for the Ninth district, which comprises Lake Michigan and Green Bay, the South Milwaukee light was placed third in order of necessity. The bill in question is inclosed herewith.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN MILLIS,
Captain, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., Engineer Secretary.

Hon. THEOBOLD OTJEN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

T. J. PITZER.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 4842) for the relief of T. J. Pitzer, with an amendment which is indicated in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman and passed under a suspension of the rules will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of T. J. Pitzer, of Barbourville, Ky., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400, for mules taken from him and used for the public service during the late civil war.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask a second, Mr. Speaker, on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now let us have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. COLSON. I ask for the reading of the report, which is perhaps the best explanation of the bill that can be made.

The report (by Mr. PUGH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4842) for the relief of T. J. Pitzer, report as follows:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report from the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and recommend that the bill referred to them do pass.

[House Report No. 1625, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The claimant, Thomas J. Pitzer, of Knox County, Ky., brings this claim for $400, the price of two good mules taken from him in 1864, at or near Barbourville, Ky. The proof is conclusive that claimant was a loyal citizen, and it is equally as well shown that the two mules were taken and used by the Army of the United States. The witnesses differ a little as to the value of the mules, one witness fixing the value at $150 each, and the other at $200 each. The committee fix the value at the sum of $200 each, making $400 for the two, and this sum they recommend be paid claimant. The committee think there is nothing in the statement of the agent of the Quartermaster-General that claimant purchased these mules from some men residing in a State in insurrection, there being absolutely nothing in the record to show any collusion or bad faith in any part of the transaction.

The committee are of the opinion that the claim should be allowed, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky what evidence the committee had in the Forty-ninth Congress that these mules were not purchased from some one in the Confederate States who was engaged in the rebellion?

Mr. COLSON. Well, Mr. Speaker, the committee had sufficient information to warrant them in making the report which has just been read. It is entirely satisfactory to the committee, and I suppose the House will be willing to accept the report of the committee based on their own investigation of facts. I know the party who is interested in the bill, and I am aware of the fact that it is a meritorious measure and ought to be passed.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman why the claim was not paid years ago?

Mr. COLSON. Simply because the Government refused to pass on the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there have been many chances to have it paid.

Mr. COLSON. Well, you know yourself that there are thousands of bills, meritorious bills, that can not pass through the House.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; that may be as to a bill; but is it not true that the Quartermaster-General, under the general law, was authorized to settle all claims for a period of ten or twelve years?

Mr. COLSON. Yes; that is probably true.

Mr. CANNON. And a number of them were so settled, and a limitation was fixed upon their presentation.

I will ask the gentleman if this claim was ever presented to the Quartermaster-General?

Mr. COLSON. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman knowledge of the facts?

Mr. COLSON. I am quite sure it never was.

Mr. CANNON. Then it must be barred.

Mr. COLSON. I think not. At all events, it is within the power of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; we may appropriate for any possible purpose on earth.

Mr. COLSON. And it is sometimes done.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not say that we can not. But I am asking if there has been any action taken upon this by the parties heretofore? Now, if these parties have lost their right to compensation by neglect to avail themselves of their rights under the law, why, it is their own fault.

Mr. COLSON. I think not. We have the right to grant them relief, and, Mr. Speaker, we ought to do it in good conscience. The Government secured these mules, which the owner had just bought and paid for. They were worth what the bill calls for, and I certainly would not plead limitation on an honest debt. I do not think the Government ought to.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well; I know it is ungracious to resist the payment of a little claim of $400—it looks so small. But what are the facts, and what are the effects of it after you do pass it? In a case of this kind, where property is taken by the Army for the use of the Army, in the first place they took a voucher for it, or had some evidence if not paid for at the time, and if they were not paid then, as I understand it, under the act of Congress it was provided that everybody might present his claim and submit it to the proper authorities for action.

Mr. COX. In the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. Well, they might go to the Court of Claims; but they were not put to that trouble. They were settled, as I understand it, by the Quartermaster-General. That was away back about the time of the close of the war, or shortly after. The law authorized the Quartermaster-General to settle the claims, and then finally an act was passed that all claims must be presented within a certain time, and great quantities of claims were presented and allowed, while many others were presented and disallowed.

Now, if the gentleman can state that he has examined, and that this claim was never presented, why then it would be for Congress to say whether they would appropriate for it, notwithstanding it is barred by the statute.

Mr. COLSON. The gentleman well understands that there were a good many persons who had meritorious claims who were not allowed their rights under the law.

Mr. CANNON. I never heard of any. Now, what I want to know is whether this is one of that kind.

Mr. COLSON. Well, I should say it was.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman any knowledge of that matter?

Mr. COLSON. I have knowledge of the fact that it is a meritorious claim, and I think they did not apply to the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. CANNON. Then it never has been acted upon by the Government?

Mr. COLSON. It never has been acted upon.

Mr. BOATNER. The Committee on Claims gave it a very thorough investigation.

Mr. COLSON. Yes; we investigate all claims thoroughly.

Mr. HUNTER. The agent of the Department did examine that claim.

Mr. COLSON. I think not.

Mr. DOCKERY. There seems to have been some grave question, indeed, as to the value of the mules, and the doubt seems to have been resolved against the Government.

Mr. HUNTER. The claim has been examined.

Mr. COX. Examined by whom?

Mr. HUNTER. By the agent of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will not allow this claim to pass simply because it is small.

Mr. COLSON. I now remember that the question involved was the claim that the party bought the mules from a person who resided in a State that was in insurrection, and therefore some doubt was thrown on the claim.

Mr. CANNON. So that the gentleman was in error——

Mr. COLSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. About this claim never having been submitted to the Quartermaster-General. Now—

The committee think——

Mr. COLSON. That report which the gentleman has is a former report.

Mr. CANNON (reading):

The committee think there is nothing in the statement of the agent of the Quartermaster-General that claimant purchased these mules from some men residing in a State in insurrection, there being absolutely nothing in the record to show any collusion or bad faith in any part of the transaction.

Now, it does seem that we are authorized to suppose that these parties were vigilant, that they preferred their claims before the Quartermaster-General, that the agent of the Quartermaster-General, as the law directed, reported and found that these claimants purchased these mules from parties residing in a State in insurrection, and therefore rejected the claim, as they properly ought to have done.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman another question. I want to ask him whether $200 is not a very high price for a mule?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not know; I think mules, especially Kentucky mules, away back at the time of the war, were worth $200 apiece.

Mr. COLSON. The testimony shows that this gentleman paid that much money for the mules, and I submit to this House whether, in equity and good conscience, this bill ought not to be paid.

Mr. BOATNER. Was there any law against buying mules from people in insurrection?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, gentlemen understand what the legislation was.

Mr. COLSON. I do not want to understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as objecting to paying for anything which the Government received and put to its own use. The Government took this property, used it for its own purposes, and now this party comes here and seeks relief. He had purchased these mules. They belonged to him. It is a question for this House to say whether he ought not to be reimbursed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let us take a vote on it. I think you are entitled to a vote.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. These were Kentucky mules, and not Indiana mules. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLSON. I should not come here and present this claim if I did not believe it to be meritorious.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I am authorized from the statement in this report which I have read, to infer that this claim was presented to the Quartermaster-General and adjudicated under the law.

Mr. COLSON. And rejected on a mere technicality.

Mr. CANNON. And rejected. Now, as it was rejected, that is the end of it, unless Congress intervenes and gives it life.

Mr. BOATNER. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think that the Quartermaster-General made an error?

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman asks Congress to intervene and give it life. Upon what information? Upon the bare statement of the committee, of which he says he is a member, back in the Forty-ninth Congress, that they think the Quartermaster-General was mistaken.

Mr. LOUD. That is a bad Congress, too.

Mr. CANNON. My friend knew so little about it himself that but a few minutes ago he thought it had not been presented to that Department.

Mr. COLSON. That slipped my memory. I have been familiar with the facts.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, this is a matter of $400. I do not care whether the House passes it or not; but I do say that I have no doubt there are millions of dollars of just as worthy claims as this that have been rejected by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. COLSON. This gentleman has been here with this bill before, and it is not his fault that Congress has not given him relief.

Mr. HULICK. On what ground was this claim rejected by the Quartermaster-General?

Mr. COLSON. On some technicality.

Mr. HULICK. What was it?

Mr. COLSON. That some party from whom he purchased the mules seems to have resided in a State that was in insurrection.

Mr. BAILEY. We would like to hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I have some of my time left, and I desire to yield as much as may be necessary to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am much surprised that a case of this character, involving so great a principle as it does, should occupy the time of this House and that we should occupy the time of the House in rejecting a case that had been adjudicated in days gone by, or that such a case could have got the eye of the Speaker. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] seems apparently willing to act upon this case, because it involves but $400. But is it not just as important, let me ask the gentleman from Illinois, to resist it with all the means in his power as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who as such is supposed to look after ruthless attempts to appropriate public money by this body, by every means in his power, as though it carried $400,000? Why, if this bill passed, Mr. Speaker, we have added but another precedent to a line that has been established, and the principle made come here to-morrow. If we have a case perhaps of $800 or $8,000, it would be claimed that this House has already established a precedent in passing bills of this character.

Now, while it may seem, perhaps, a waste of time to many gentlemen who have cases that they would like to have passed this afternoon to take up the time of this body to save to the Government the small sum of $400, yet I feel myself mean enough, if you feel inclined to express it in that way, to resist this claim as strongly as I would if it carried $4,000,000. The claim should not be paid; it has not a spark of equity or justice in it from beginning to end; and I appeal to the judgment of any man on the floor of this House—I even appeal to the judgment of the gentleman who presents it to know if he will apply the rule he invokes in this case to another one in some other district of the country? I hope the House will most emphatically, by an emphatic vote, defeat the passage of this bill, small as it is in amount.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California refers to the principle involved. I regret to consume the time of the House and the time that has been consumed in the consideration of this measure; but so far as the principle involved in this bill is concerned, I agree with him that it is just as important as if the bill carried $4,000,000; and the Government is under as much obligation to pay this $400 that the bill carries as it would be to pay $4,000,000 due to somebody else. It would be under as much obligation to pass the bill if it carried $4,000,000 as it is a bill carrying only $400. You talk about the principle involved. The Government took the property. The owner of the property was powerless to prevent the Government from taking it. And now the question is whether this Congress will sit here and say that this great Government of the United States should not pay a poor man for the two mules which it took from him the sum of $400 that he demands when he shows he paid that for the mules. That is the only question I submit to this House. The gentleman from California is a constitutional objector. He objects to these measures regardless of the right of the thing. I do not believe that this House will support the objections of the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California needs no defense at my hands. His splendid record as a Representative is his best defense. So far as the criticism which has just been laid at his door—a "constitutional objector"—I may say that I commend him most heartily and fully for the consistent course he has pursued in this House in attempting to defend the Treasury of the United States from unwarranted assaults. I remember to have read a few days since an interview with a distinguished public official in which, by way of explaining the fact that the expenditures of the Government were constantly increasing, he stated that in the organization of the House and the Senate there were no committees clothed with the express duty and power of defending the Treasury.

I recognize the fact that to a certain extent our organization is defective in that respect, and I am willing to stand here, even though it involves odium, to uphold the efforts of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] in defense of the Treasury when gentlemen seek to pass bills calling for the expenditure of public money for musty old claims that ought never to have been presented to this House. We need an organization, Mr. Speaker, to speak for the taxpayers of the United States. Under the unwritten law and custom, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is perhaps the only one that can stand in the way of these unwarranted expenditures without risk of incurring the odium that may be involved in the idea expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky.

This bill has had its day in court. As to amount, it involves, to be sure, only $400; but in principle it involves very much more than that. If we are to go back and disturb the settlements made heretofore of questions growing out of the war, then I can present from Missouri, from my own district, hundreds and thousands of claims just as worthy, just as equitable, just as honest as the one now presented by the gentleman from Kentucky. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] will not be deterred by the criticism which has fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Kentucky, but will stand in the future, as they have stood in the past, against all these bills involving expenditure of the people's money where it is not necessary for the honest, frugal administration of governmental affairs.

Mr. HULICK. Does the gentleman mean that he is opposed to these bills whether they are right or not?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir. I am in favor of all bills that are right; but this bill comes here tainted with suspicion.

Mr. COLSON. I deny that. The gentleman does not dispute the fact that the Government took this property?

Mr. DOCKERY. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, these were very high-priced mules. [Laughter.] There is a doubt as to the value of the mules, and the doubt, as in all these cases, is resolved against the Government. One witness testified that they were worth perhaps $150 apiece, and another that they were worth $200, and thereupon the committee proceeded to allow $200 apiece. Then, from a statement in the report we are authorized to infer that there was a question raised as to whether or not these mules were not purchased in an insurrectionary district. I do not know what the facts were, and this House does not and can not know what the facts were, and that only illustrates still more strikingly the absurdity of going back and, by special legislation, ripping up settlements made by authorized tribunals in the years immediately succeeding the war. As I understand it, the Quartermaster-General was authorized to settle all claims of this character. This claim was presented to him; it had its day in court; it was rejected, and now, more than thirty years after the war, it is attempted to be put through here by a special act. I hope the House will vote down this bill.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. COLSON] is entitled to five minutes more.

Mr. COLSON. I yield my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky. In my short experience as a member of Congress I have at all times endeavored to speak in favor of reasonable economy and have voted that way, but I have observed that claims against the Government of a certain class, coming from a certain section of the country, invariably excite an interest and an opposition which is to me remarkable and astonishing. Why, sir, it seems to me from my brief experience here that if a claim against the Government has the merit of being a large one it may pass, but if it has the misfortune of covering but a small amount, then, however meritorious it may be, it is sure to meet with determined opposition. My distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is always an economist, but why he should find such a great principle involved in this bill as to call forth this animated discussion I do not understand, unless it be upon the ground that it is wrong to pay a loyal man who lived in the South for property taken from him by the Government during the war.

Now, sir, on that question I want to repeat what I said on a former occasion on this floor, that if there is any class of men in this country who deserve just consideration at the hands of this Government, in my opinion it is the loyal men of the South, the men of Kentucky, of Tennessee, of all the border States, as well as farther south. [Applause.] That is my sincere belief, and I do not understand why it is that these little claims, coming from that section, are always found to involve such important principles and to be so objectionable. The loyal men in those States were subjected to ostracism, to corporal punishment, sometimes to death, at the hands of those who surrounded them, and yet they stood faithful to the Union. Such a man lived, say, in Kentucky or in Tennessee, where at one time the armies of the South would drive back the Union troops and would devastate and destroy his property, and then the Union Army would again sweep over the same territory, drive back the Southern army, and in their turn would devastate and destroy.

Such a man comes here saying, "I was a Union man; you took my mules, for which I paid $200 each; you ought to pay me for them." But the Government says to him, "Your claim is too old; why have you not had it paid before?" The answer is to be found in the obstacles such as I have witnessed to-day thrown in the path of men urging these just claims. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that these claims of loyal men of the South against the Government for property taken to maintain the armies of the Union when they were surrounded by enemies in that country should receive respectful consideration and prompt payment at the hands of the Congress of the country. [Applause.]

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, there were on a division (called for by Mr. DOCKERY)—ayes 68, noes 37.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HITT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills, with the view of taking up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. Pending this motion, I should like to make an agreement with my friend on the opposite side [Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky] as to the time to be occupied in general debate. I do not desire myself more than five or ten minutes. This is a purely business bill, as to which there is no dissent whatever.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. This bill is almost exactly identical with the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill passed at the last session. I know of no necessity for any extended debate.

Mr. HITT. Shall we say ten minutes?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I think not exceeding ten minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. HITT. Then I make that proposition a part of my former motion.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I desire to present a conference report.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7 and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6; and the Senate agree to the same.

N. M. CURTIS,
M. GRIFFIN,
D. G. TYLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

R. F. PETTIGREW,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STEELE. We should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There ought to be a written statement accompanying the report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] make the objection that there is no written statement from the House conferees?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think there ought to be a statement of some kind.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I can explain the matter in a few minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to the gentleman submitting an oral statement.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think I can make a statement in a few moments which will be acceptable.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that on a general appropriation bill the requirement of the rule ought to be adhered to, and I feel disposed to insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] makes the point that the conference report can not be received in the absence of a written statement of the House conferees, as required by the rules. The Chair sustains the point.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. I now renew my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills. Pending that motion, he moves that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill be limited to ten minutes. The question is on agreeing to the motion for a limitation of general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being then taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10134) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the general debate, I move that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this bill makes provision for the foreign service of the United States; and in doing so it repeats largely the existing law. The amount which the bill proposes to appropriate is $1,676,908.76. The Secretary of State in his estimate, transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, estimated for nearly $400,000 more than this sum. But owing to the provision in the twenty-first rule of the House, forbidding the committee to report any appropriation not authorized by existing law, we were not at liberty to report in this bill those large expenditures. The principal one was $350,000 for the world's fair at Paris in 1900. There was another for an art exposition at Munich, $20,000. These and other propositions submitted, we were prohibited by the rules from incorporating in the bill.

There is an increase of $33,350 in the amount which the bill appropriates over the amount provided in the law of last year. That, however, is not in fact $33,000 of additional expenditure by the Government or additional charge upon the Treasury. It is larger than the amount appropriated in this particular bill last year simply because we have, at the request of the Secretary of State, inserted in the bill a provision which was formerly in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the survey of the water boundary between the United States and Mexico, and a provision for the international prison congress.

There is also, Mr. Chairman, an apparent increase in the bill of about $10,000 in the salaries paid to consuls, but instead of that being an increase of expenditure, or an increased charge upon the Treasury, it is retrenchment; it is a compliance with a law which requires the Secretary, in the estimates, and impliedly requires the committee, to provide in salaries for the offices where the fees are such large sums that it is deemed better to pay salaries and turn the fees into the Treasury. In these newly salaried consulates, to the amount of about $10,000—or, to be exact, $9,500 in new salaries and one increase of $500—the fees paid are $12,936.50; and the retrenchment in fact by the apparent increase will be, in exact numbers, $3,436.50.

That explains the apparent increase of $33,000 above the law of last year, and I may say generally, as to the bill, that while the sum seems a large one, a considerable part of it is in the nature of provision against possibilities or contingencies which may not arise rather than a provision for certain expenditures. For instance, $5,000 of the appropriation in one of its paragraphs, fees and costs in extradition cases, is an appropriation that will all be reimbursed by foreign countries who reclaim their criminals in this country. Of the $5,000 to bring home our criminals, a large part is reimbursed by the States where the offenses are against State laws, but not where the offenses are against the Federal laws. With reference to the neutrality-act item of $8,000, only one-half of that appropriation is sometimes expended; we have cut it down from the $10,000 formerly appropriated to $8,000. An emergency fund is provided which may be needed or may not be needed. But whether it be expended or not expended, it ought to be there, ready and available for use if required.

So, too, with reference to the fund for the protection and relief of seamen, which in certain cases in the past was all required and in other years has involved far less expenditure. For this fund $50,000 has been heretofore appropriated.

These and similar items, Mr. Chairman, make up about $100,000 of the bill, which will probably not be all expended.

So, too, with reference to the $28,000 which is provided for the Bureau of American Republics. We pay that out as an actual expenditure, but $12,000 is to be reimbursed to us by the other Governments, parties to the agreement and controlling the Bureau jointly with us. Our portion is about $16,000.

There is no substantial increase, except contingent allowance for clerks at consulates, an increase of $5,000; contingent expenses of foreign missions, an increase of $5,000.

Generally the bill is similar to that which the House has so often considered and accepted.

I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky the remainder of the time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat, I would like to ask a question for my personal information. I see it stated that portions of the foreign service are under the civil-service law, and it does not appear in the report of the Civil Service Commission what the officers are. Can the chairman of the committee throw light upon that point for the information of the House or for my own information?

Mr. HITT. I have a letter here from the Assistant Secretary of State in my hands, which I will quote.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, ——, 189—.

SIR: In reply to your letter of ——, I would state that, under the Executive order of September 20, 1895, vacancies in consulates or commercial agencies the salary of which is not more than $2,500 or less than $1,000, or the official fees of which do not exceed the former or fall below the latter sum, will hereafter be filled by the appointment of either: (1) Persons holding positions under the Department of State; (2) persons having previously served under the Department; or (3) from among persons who, having furnished the customary evidence of character, responsibility, and capacity, and having been thereupon selected by the President for examination, have been found upon such examination to be qualified for the position.

Applications for offices falling within the above limits should be addressed to the Secretary of State, the name of the vacancy applied for being indicated, as well as the special qualifications for such office of the applicant, and this application should be accompanied by such indorsements as to applicant's character, responsibility, and capacity as he may be able to furnish.

W. W. ROCKHILL,
Assistant Secretary.

I may state, as a matter of information, that of the nominations so made by the President, I am informed that more than a majority have been rejected by the examination adopted.

I will insert also in the RECORD with my remarks, for the information of members, the circular statement of the Department, the letter of the Secretary of State to the President of September 17, 1895; the Executive order of President Cleveland of September 20, 1895; the order of the Secretary of State of September 23, 1895; and Assistant Secretary Rockhill's letter, all bearing upon this subject.

They are as follows:

EXAMINATIONS FOR THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

By an Executive order, dated September 20, 1895, the President of the United States directed that thereafter any vacancy in a consulate or commercial agency with an annual salary or compensation from official fees of not more than $2,500 nor less than $1,000 should be filled by transfer or promotion from some other position under the Department of State of a character tending to qualify the incumbent for the position to be filled; by the appointment of a person not under the Department of State, but having previously served thereunder to its satisfaction in a capacity tending to qualify him for the position to be filled; or by the appointment of a person who, having been selected by the President for examination, is found, upon such examination, to be qualified for the position. Posts which pay less than $1,000 being usually filled by selection from residents of the locality, it was not deemed practicable to put them under the new system. Excluding these places, numbering 71 at present, and also the places above $2,500, numbering 53, the number of consular positions within the scope of the order is 196. But as the consular officers who receive less compensation than $1,000 are paid by fees, and these fluctuate and will probably increase with the return of improved business conditions, the number of places that may be included in the new system of appointments is, as yet, undetermined. For this reason, an attempt to give a list of places accessible under the Executive order would be misleading.

LETTER OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

The action of the President was based upon a communication from the Secretary of State, as follows:

The President:

SIR: Complaints of the consular service of the United States, of the incompetency of consuls, and of the injurious consequences to great public interests, are not infrequently brought to the notice of the Department, sometimes by direct communication, but more commonly through the medium of the public press. That they are not always well founded is clear, and instances are by no means rare in which interested parties indulge in the severest condemnation of officials whose only fault has been a proper adherence to the line of their legitimate duties. Merchants or others who demand that public functions shall be ignored or exceeded for the promotion of particular and private ends ought to find themselves disappointed, and if they are, may be expected to rail without stint at the officer who has refused to be their tool. Nevertheless, the consular office is of great importance in its relation to the commercial interests of the country (every consul should, so far as practicable, be chosen for his special fitness for the particular position in which he is to serve), and it can not be denied that while complaints against consuls are in some cases unwarranted, there are only too many others which can not be so regarded.

It is contended by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other like bodies all over the country that if our consular service were what it should be and our consuls were officials chosen for their fitness for the duties to be discharged by them, the results to the trade and commerce of the country would be of the most favorable character. The contention seems reasonable in itself, and is supported by the practice and experience of Great Britain and other European countries. Congress has, to some extent, recognized its justness by the statutes providing for consular pupils and consular clerks to be appointed upon satisfactory evidence of qualification, derived through examinations or otherwise. By the act of 1864, these officials, originally limited to twenty-five in number and called consular pupils, are designated as consular clerks and limited to thirteen in number, and are not to be removed from office except for cause stated to Congress in writing. It is pertinent to note also, in this connection, that at the last session of Congress bills to improve the consular service, by securing competency and fitness in its officers, were introduced into the Senate by representatives of both political parties. It is the executive branch of the Government, however, which might be expected to be most strongly impressed with the defects of our consular service, and by which appropriate measures for removing them would most naturally be initiated.

Hence it is not surprising to find that in 1866 the Department of State promulgated an order requiring all applicants for consulates to present themselves for examination at the Department. Neither the original order nor any copy of it can now be found. But the board of examiners, consisting of the Second Assistant Secretary of State, the examiner of claims, and the officer in charge of the consular division, met, organized, and held examinations under the order, and out of 9 applicants approved 7 as satisfactory. The other 2 were held not to be qualified, one because lacking in knowledge of foreign languages, the other because of general incompetency. It does not appear that more than one examination was held under this order of 1866, and the next step taken in the same direction seems to have been by an Executive order of April 16, 1872. How much was done under this regulation is not clear, and at all events it was soon superseded by the Executive order of March 14, 1873. This order, made like that of April 16, 1872, under the civil-service act of March 3, 1871, and during the life of the commission organized under that statute, is as follows: "Vacancies occurring in any grade of consulates or clerkships in the Department may be filled either by transfer from some other grade or service, clerical, consular, or diplomatic under the Department of State, or by the appointment of some person who has previously served under the Department of State to its satisfaction, or by the appointment of some person who has made application to the Secretary of State with proper certificates of character, responsibility, and capacity, in the manner provided for applications for consulates of which the annual compensation is more than $1,000 and less than $3,000, and who has, on examination, been found qualified for the position."

Under this order, an examination board was organized by the Secretary of State, consisting of three officials serving in the State Department at Washington. A general regulation was also adopted, by which, upon a consulate becoming vacant, notice in writing in a form prescribed by the Secretary of State was sent to applicants for consulships.

This notice stated in substance that the vacancy had occurred; that the applicant was to attend for examination at the State Department on the day named; that, in addition to the usual subjects, he would be examined upon the third and eleventh chapters of the first volume of Kent's Commentaries, and upon the "Regulations for the consular service of the United States;" that reasonable time would be given an applicant to familiarize himself with such "regulations," copies of which could be had for 80 cents, and that before such examination the applicant must file with the Department a paper certifying to his honesty, trustworthiness, good repute, steady habits, and capacity to perform the duties of a consul, and signed either by a person personally known to the Secretary of State or by some person with means of information vouched for by one personally known to the Secretary of State. Conformably to these regulations made under the Executive order of March 14, 1873, quite a number of persons were examined during the years 1873 and 1874. The examinations were conducted through questions and answers in writing, and the examination papers are still on file in the Department. The system thus generally described is said to have worked well in practice, and to have both improved the consular service and relieved the Department of much embarrassment. It was, nevertheless, short lived, and though the necessary connection between the two things is not obvious, it seems to have been given up simultaneously with the relinquishment of its functions by the Civil Service Commission of 1871, a relinquishment brought about by the refusal of Congress to make any appropriations for that branch of the service.

The civil-service act of 1871, now in force as section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, authorizes the President "to prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries, and may prescribe their duties and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointments in the civil service." It may be that these statutory provisions can not be so utilized as to bring about that complete reform and improvement of the consular service which are universally conceded to be desirable. It may be that costly and elaborate machinery of the character provided by the Senate bills already referred to will be found necessary to that end. But, even if that be so, it is still to be remembered that the provisions of those bills have not yet been enacted by Congress and may never be, and that meanwhile it can do no harm, and may do much good, to make a thorough trial of the efficiency of such regulations as are authorized by section 1753 of the Revised Statutes. I therefore venture to recommend the adoption of an executive order in the terms of a paper which is hereto appended, marked B. It differs in detail, rather than in principle, from the other executive orders already referred to. It assumes that consuls may properly be chosen from two classes of persons without examination, namely, from persons already in the service of the State Department or from persons formerly in its service, and who in each case have not only satisfactory records of service, but of service tending to qualify them for the duties of consul. It requires all other persons, being first selected as eligible for examination upon the ordinary proofs of competency and good character, to submit themselves to an examination designed to test their aptitude and fitness for the special functions of the consular office. Thus, on the one hand, the appointing power is left at liberty to avail itself of whatever special capacity and fitness for the consular office actual service has demonstrated to exist. On the other hand, by reserving to itself the designation of the persons eligible for examination, the appointing power protects itself to some extent at least from the errors sure to follow from absolute reliance upon purely academic tests of fitness. Finally, it should be borne in mind that the order now recommended is in no sense final or exhaustive. Experience will doubtless prove in what respects it may be amended or enlarged to the advantage of the public interest. But meanwhile it may surely be claimed for it that it will be at least a step in the right direction, and a step to be judged of not by the advance it itself makes, but by the advance it may rightly be expected to inevitably lead to.

The incumbents of such consular offices as are scarcely inferior in dignity and importance to that of minister must, it is believed, continue to be selected as heretofore at the personal discretion and upon the personal responsibility of the Executive. It is to be borne in mind, too, that there are a large number of such offices, the emoluments of which are less than $1,000—the lowest salary attached by law to any consular position—which are paid only by fees, and which, as a rule, must be filled from the residents of the particular locality where the office is established. The annexed order, therefore, does not apply to either of these classes. On the other hand, it does in terms apply to commercial agents, so called, officers with functions to all intents and purposes the same as consuls, and thus embraces within its operation nearly three-fourths of the whole number of consular and quasi-consular offices of such rank and yielding such compensation as to be desired and sought for by citizens resident within the United States.

Very respectfully,

RICHARD OLNEY.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

It being of great importance that the consuls and commercial agents of the United States shall possess the proper qualifications for their respective positions, to be ascertained either through a satisfactory record of previous actual service under the Department of State or through an appropriate examination:

It is hereby ordered that any vacancy in a consulate or commercial agency now or hereafter existing, the salary of which is not more than $2,500 nor less than $1,000, or the compensation of which, if derived from official fees, exclusive of notarial and other unofficial receipts, does not exceed $2,500 nor fall below $1,000, shall be filled (a) by a transfer or promotion from some other position under the Department of State of a character tending to qualify the incumbent for the position to be filled; or (b) by appointment of a person not under the Department of State, but having previously served thereunder to its satisfaction in a capacity tending to qualify him for the position to be filled; or (c) by the appointment of a person who, having furnished the customary evidence of character, responsibility, and capacity, and being thereupon selected by the President for examination, is found upon such examination to be qualified for the position.

For the purposes of this order notarial and unofficial fees shall not be regarded, but the compensation of a consulate or commercial agency shall be ascertained, if the office is salaried, by reference to the last preceding appropriation act, and if the office is not salaried, by reference to the returns of official fees for the last preceding fiscal year.

The examination hereinbefore provided for shall be by a board of three persons designated by the Secretary of State, who shall also prescribe the subjects to which such examinations shall relate and the general mode of conducting the same by the board.

A vacancy in a consulate will be filled at discretion only when a suitable appointment can not be made in any of the modes indicated in the second paragraph of this order.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 20, 1895.

ORDER OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

In pursuance of the Executive order of September 20, 1895, the Third Assistant Secretary of State, the Solicitor of the State Department, and the Chief of the Consular Bureau, or the persons for the time being respectively discharging the duties of said offices, are hereby constituted a board, whose duty it shall be, by appropriate examination, to determine the qualifications for the respective positions of persons selected for such examination by the President and applying for such consulates and commercial agencies as are included within the scope of said order. Vacancies occurring in said board, or such changes in the membership thereof as experience may prove to be desirable, will be dealt with by additional regulations as occasion may require.

The examination herein provided for shall be held from time to time at the State Department in Washington, upon such notice to candidates as shall give them reasonable opportunity to attend for the purpose in question.

Such examinations shall be by questions and answers in writing, unless for special reasons the board consider it desirable in any particular case to conduct an examination viva voce, in which case, however, a stenographer shall be present and shall report all the proceedings.

The subjects to which an examination shall relate shall be:

(1) General education, knowledge of languages, business training and experience.

(2) The country in which the consul or commercial agent is to reside, its government, chief magistrate, geographical features, principal cities, chief production, and its commercial intercourse and relations with the United States.

(3) The exequatur, its nature and use.

(4) Functions of a consul or commercial agent as compared with those of a vice-consul or consular agent; relation of former to latter, also to the United States minister or ambassador at the capital of the country.

(5) Duties of a consul or commercial agent as regards:

(a) Correspondence with the State Deparment and the form thereof.

(b) Passports, granting and visaing.

(c) United States merchant vessels in a foreign port, and their crews, whether seeking discharge, deserting, or destitute.

(d) Wrecks within the jurisdiction.

(e) Wrongs to United States citizens within jurisdiction.

(f) Invoices.

(g) Official fees and accounts.

(6) Treaties between the United States and the foreign country.

(7) Relations of ambassador and minister to laws of the country to which they are accredited, as compared with those of consul or commercial agent to those of the countries where they reside.

(8) Acts of ambassador or minister, how far binding upon his country.

(9) Diplomatic, judicial, and commercial functions of consuls or commercial agents.

(10) Piracy, what it is and where punishable.

(11) Consular Regulations of the United States, copy of which (to be returned to the Department) will be supplied to each candidate upon application.

(12) Such other subject or subjects as the board may deem important and appropriate in any particular case.

The examining board is authorized to issue such notices and to make all such rules as they may deem necessary to accomplish the objects of this regulation, and immediately upon the conclusion of such examination will make to the Secretary of State a report in writing, stating whether in their judgment the candidate is or is not qualified for the particular position applied for, and if the decision is adverse to the candidate, also briefly summarizing the grounds of such decision.

RICHARD OLNEY,
Secretary of State.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1895.

CIRCULAR TO APPLICANTS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, ——, 189—.

SIR: In reply to your letter of ——, I would state that, under the executive order of September 20, 1895, vacancies in consulates or commercial agencies the salary of which is not more than $2,500 or less than $1,000, or the official fees of which do not exceed the former or fall below the latter sum, will hereafter be filled by the appointment of either: (1) Persons holding positions under the Department of State; (2) persons having previously served under the Department; or (3) from among persons who, having furnished the customary evidence of character, responsibility, and capacity, and having been thereupon selected by the President for examination, have been found upon such examination to be qualified for the position.

Applications for offices falling within the above limits should be addressed to the Secretary of State, the name of the vacancy applied for being indicated, as well as the special qualifications for such office of the applicant, and this application should be accompanied by such indorsements as to applicant's character, responsibility, and capacity as he may be able to furnish.

When the President shall have decided to fill any vacancy occurring among the consular offices in the above-mentioned classes, such candidates for it belonging to the third class as shall have been selected by him after examination of their applications and indorsements will be notified of the date of the examination and of the subjects on which said examination will bear, and they will also be supplied with such other papers as the examining board shall deem necessary for their guidance.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. W. ROCKHILL,
Third Assistant Secretary.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is this a board of the State Department or of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. HITT. It is a board appointed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not done under the civil-service law?

Mr. HITT. It is not under the act of 1883, commonly called the civil-service law. It is done under the act of 1871.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Do these requirements apply to all consular and diplomatic appointments?

Mr. HITT. All of twenty-five hundred dollars and under which are over $1,000.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time that is allowed I wish to say that I served on the subcommittee with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] and it is hardly necessary for me to add very much to what he has said; but I desire to say that this bill was carefully prepared, and that in its details it is substantially the same as the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill that was passed last year. The increase which has been made was absolutely necessary. The Secretary of State recommended certain increases that were not made. They were not allowed by the rules of the House of Representatives. The estimates that were sent to us by the Secretary of the Treasury amounted to $405,620 more than the amount which we have appropriated. It can be said, also, in favor of this bill that the appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service are smaller than in any other of the general appropriation bills. It is also a fact that we receive about $1,000,000 from our consular service, which, when subtracted from the whole amount of this bill, $1,676,908.76, leaves only about $600,000 as the cost of our diplomatic and consular service for one year. This bill carries a net increase of $33,000 over the last bill, and every increase that has been made was deemed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to be absolutely essential.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] inform us whether the present bill continues our relation as it has hitherto stood to the Samoan Islands? Are we by this bill contributing to the support of the Samoan Government or the maintenance of a government in that country?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there was a treaty entered into some years ago known as the Berlin treaty. The United States, England, and Germany were represented in the negotiation of that treaty. It was a tripartite agreement. One of the gentlemen who represented the United States was our distinguished friend, Hon. William Walter Phelps, who served in Congress several terms and was afterwards minister to Germany. Under that treaty, I would say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], England, Germany, and the United States were each to pay a portion of the expense of maintaining the King of Samoa and a chief justice, and other expenses if deemed necessary by the parties to the treaty. Every year since that treaty was made Congress has appropriated a small amount of money to pay the part due from the United States, and England and Germany have also paid their respective portions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate, by order of the House, has expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] be allowed to complete this interesting chronicle.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that can be done after the House has ordered the debate closed, but the Chair will suggest that the moment a paragraph is read debate under the five-minute rule will be in order.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will say to my friend from Georgia that after the reading of the bill is commenced I shall be glad to give him further information, if desired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, severally appropriated, in full compensation for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to elicit from my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] this very interesting information of which I am in pursuit. I have not forgotten the story of this treaty. I have never, however, been able to reconcile it with my judgment as to the duty of this Government in its relations to foreign peoples, and have never been able to feel that we were occupying exactly the attitude which was most consistent with the spirit of our institutions in this Samoan affair. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] has no doubt correctly recited the inception of this affair, but according to my recollection the President or Secretary of State, or both, have inveighed against the continuance of this state of things. I think sometimes that they stated in their annual reports that they have in vain called the attention of Congress to it. If such is the case, I should like to know why this state of things is still continued, and I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] for that purpose.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the amount of the appropriation to pay our part under the Berlin treaty to which I have referred is no new matter in this House. It has been called up repeatedly, and I have said in this House repeatedly when the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was under consideration that I did not approve of that part of the treaty which required the United States to assist in maintaining a king on the throne of Samoa. It is not necessary for me to repeat it, for I do not approve of it now. But here is a solemn treaty obligation, entered into between the United States, Germany, and England, and subsequently ratified by the Senate, which has that power under the Constitution; and Congress has been making an appropriation every year since that ratification in about this language:

PROTECTING INTERESTS OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE SAMOAN ISLANDS.

For the execution of the obligations of the United States and the protection of the interests and property of the United States in the Samoan Islands, under any existing treaty with the Government of said islands and with the Governments of Germany and Great Britain, $6,000, to be expended under the direction of the President.

The proper way to be relieved of the necessity for making the appropriation now criticised is by negotiations between our Government and the Governments of Germany and Great Britain abrogating the treaty, or by the passage of an act of Congress annulling that part of the treaty requiring the appropriation to be made.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the $6,000 expended for?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It is, under the treaty, our part to help pay the expenses of the King and the chief justice, and for the benefit of American interests.

Mr. HITT. It is the judge's salary and the expenses of the court.

Mr. McCLELLAN. And the chief justice is an American.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. He was originally an Englishman; but the chief justice is now an American.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is the King under the civil service? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. This matter, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, has been called to the attention of Congress heretofore. It has been commented on in this House, and for one I suppose there is no chance to break through this appropriation bill and prevent this appropriation; but I do not believe that it is consistent with our duties as Representatives nor is it a proper discharge of the duty we owe to our Government to tax the people of the United States for the purpose of paying the salary of any king in the world nor the expenses of any kingly government. I have never favored it and never shall.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. May I ask if this King is under the same protection of the civil-service laws as the rest? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not catch the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. He is still looking after the offices.

Mr. MORSE. He wants to know if the King is under civil-service rules.

Mr. McMILLIN. The payment of the King was started by a rule that ought never to have been adopted by this country.

Mr. HITT. But the gentleman will agree with me that this is a treaty obligation, and it does not lie in the House to set aside a treaty obligation.

Mr. McMILLIN. But Congress can repeal it, and the House can refuse to appropriate, and ought to do so. It is as un-American as anything can be. If the principle is right to pay tribute of $6,000, it may not be wrong to contribute $6,000,000. The principle is the same in a small amount as in a large one. This thing has been called to the attention of the House time and time again, and there ought to be no let up by this House until it is gotten rid of in some way. I am not saying this by way of reflection upon the gentlemen who have framed this bill. They have framed it in accordance with what they considered were treaty obligations, but there ought to be nothing in the bill to force this Government to contribute to the support of a king.

Mr. MORSE. Not even the Queen of the Sandwich Islands?

Mr. McMILLIN. Not even anybody.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this treaty was made during the Administration of Mr. Harrison——

Mr. McMILLIN. That is correct; and we rebelled against it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky (continuing). In 1890. My friend from Georgia wanted to know the time. It was in 1890, during the Administration of President Harrison.

Mr. LEWIS. Was it made then, or ratified?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It was made in 1890, when our friend Mr. Phelps and others went to Berlin, and ratified shortly afterwards by the Senate of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK HIRE AT LEGATIONS.

Clerk hire at the legation to Spain, $1,200.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 9, 10, and 11, which provide $1,200 for clerk hire to the legation to Spain. The reason is that in the paragraph following there is a provision for $110,000 for contingent expenses of foreign missions, and among those you will see one item, in line 18, for clerk hire. The provision of a clerk at Madrid was put in many years ago, and the reason given for it was that in consequence of dispensing with the consul-general at that point it was supposed that there would be a good deal of work thrown on the legation. It is a very bad precedent to appropriate a specific sum of money for clerk hire, and when it is necessary it can be had from the following section, where we have made provision for clerk hire.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if the Department allows generally in the larger legations $1,200, or does it come under the general provisions?

Mr. HITT. In the larger legations it will be $600, $800, or $900, and rarely $1,200, except where there is a deficiency in clerks in some particular way. Of course, I can not go into all the details.

Mr. BAILEY. That is satisfactory.

Mr. HITT. The report of the Auditor for the State and other Departments, pages 20 to 33, gives the amount allotted to every legation in the circle of our service.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. I offered that amendment after consultation with the State Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROTECTING INTERESTS OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE SAMOAN ISLANDS.

For the execution of the obligations of the United States and the protection of the interests and property of the United States in the Samoan Islands, under any existing treaty with the Government of said islands and with the Governments of Germany and Great Britain, $6,000, to be expended under the direction of the President.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read. The committee having already been told of the nature of this appropriation and notified of it, I do not propose to take up time with further argument of the question. It strikes me that the statement of it already made is sufficient.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, as the question has already been covered by the discussion, I will not make any reply to the gentleman except to say that this provision is in the form presented by the Secretary of State, as the better way to get at the object, if a change of policy is desired, is by negotiation, rather than by disregarding the treaty.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this provision is not in pursuance of existing treaties?

Mr. HITT. It is in fulfillment of existing treaties.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. McMILLIN, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois how long he proposes to go on this evening? It is now after 5 o'clock.

Mr. HITT. We can finish reading the bill in ten or twenty minutes, I think.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is likely, because a number of us here desire to get some information, and I am sure that more than ten minutes will be required to impart it, even at the rapid rate of speaking which characterizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HITT. Well, let us proceed with the bill until the point is reached on which the gentleman desires information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consul-general at Habana, $6,000;
Consuls-general at London, Paris, and Rio de Janeiro, at $5,000 each, $15,000.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, at this point I would like to have the chairman of the committee impart some of the information that has been spoken of here. I notice that the consuls-general at London, Paris, and Rio de Janeiro get $5,000 each by this bill. Now, we see it frequently published in the papers that the consul-generalship at London is worth from $25,000 to $30,000 a year; and I would like the chairman of the committee to explain to us how it happens that on a salary of $5,000 a year that office can be worth $25,000; whether it arises from the appropriation by the consul-general of the fees; and if so, whether the law should not be amended so as to provide that the salary in each case shall indicate the actual amount of the compensation of the office.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better proceed with this in the morning.

Mr. HITT. I will answer this question, and then the committee can rise. Fees have for many years been collected at these consulates, both notarial or unofficial and fees for the administration of the oath attached to invoices, which, by the English law, was not permitted to be administered by a foreigner. The consul made a private contract with a British subject close at hand at a salary, who administered the oaths and collected the fees, which really went to the consul. The amount collected for that kind of service sometimes piled up a large sum. Protests and complaints by merchants and others were made against the system. That has been in great part stopped. Then there is also a body of notarial fees, collected for acknowledging deeds, taking affidavits, making wills, etc., for which formerly no rates were fixed, and the receipts were large. The rates recently fixed are much lower than those which used to be charged. There had been a good deal of complaint by American citizens about fees of several pounds or guineas in Great Britain, and about fees of hundreds of francs for some services on the Continent—a few minutes' work—in the consulates. That has been changed, and the scale of fees for notarial services is fixed and required to be kept publicly shown. It is a scale that the Secretary can change if, after the 4th of March next, the fees are found to be too low. They are, in fact, far below the charges that have usually been made.

Mr. LACEY. Why should they not be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. HITT. The reason is that they are, in some respects, at least, for voluntary service. They are fees for services rendered to Americans—men or women—who require them while traveling abroad. They are not strictly official duties, but more like the work of a notary or lawyer, although rendered valid by the consular seal. The truth is that the American is attracted to the consulate by the fact that the consul is clothed with official character and therefore not, like a foreign lawyer unknown to him or anyone else that he might employ outside, possibly irresponsible. The advertisement of a consul by his title brings the American traveler to him, and the service done the American generally goes from him after having paid a good fee. The notarial fees and the notarial services are all voluntary. Such services ought to be paid for and paid to the men who render them. The Government has no claim for them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to ask the gentleman how long this abuse has been going on?

Mr. HITT. I suppose it runs back to a period that, measured by the political life of individuals, might be considered antiquity. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the distinguished head of the State Department, now that he is going out of office with his civil-service crowd, has just discovered the fact.

Mr. HITT. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I have mentioned the existence of these usages several times on the floor of this House in the last fifteen years, and have several times tried to have measures adopted that would correct them. The attention of the House has been often called to the subject, and many attempts have been made to apply remedies. I think this is rather a tardy awakening on the part of the Executive.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand that the abuse has now been corrected?

Mr. HITT. I can not tell what will be the operation of the rules just promulgated, but I think there will be an improvement—that is, as to irregular fees.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do the rules contemplate the covering of those fees into the Treasury?

Mr. HITT. Not at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. In what line, then, does the reform manifest itself?

Mr. HITT. It manifests itself in the protection given to American citizens against being required to pay inordinate fees for small services. The service, however, being a voluntary service, it is right that the officers should keep the fee, whatever it may be.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the service is rendered in the time of the United States—time for which the consul receives his salary, is it not?

Mr. HITT. It is; but the time of our consular officers is not very severely tried by strict duties. I have known consuls to devote days to the work asked for by American citizens on their private business, in lawsuits, for instance, taking depositions.

Mr. LACEY. And the service is asked for and rendered by virtue of his office.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill state, if he can, what will be the reduction in the compensation of these different officers under the new order. I have endeavored to procure that information myself, but have been unsuccessful. I have no doubt, however, that the diplomatic chairman of the committee has been able to acquire it, and if he will now impart it, I am sure it will be valuable.

Mr. HITT. The answer to that question depends altogether upon one's skill in guessing. There are no available sources of accurate information. No high-paid consul is zealous to proclaim the amount of his income from all sources. No consul cares to state in detail all the services that he has rendered in the way of giving legal advice or certifying papers or aiding his countrymen at their request in what are really their private interests.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I am wrong about this matter, I want to be set right. I will ask the gentleman whether the operation of the new order will not be this: An American citizen in a foreign country who is compelled to employ the services of a native notary public or other public officer will not be charged the extravagant fees that we are all familiar with for such services, while if one of the citizens of that country requires the official act of the American consul, he can secure it at the meager rates charged in the District of Columbia. If that be so, it seems to me we are making a very strong effort to distinguish between the value of the services of our own citizens and that which our citizens are compelled to pay for the services of citizens of foreign countries.

Mr. HITT. I can not answer as to the rate which would be paid to an officer of the foreign country. By an act of Congress these officers of the United States in the consular and diplomatic service are given notarial powers. Documents authenticated by them can be used immediately, without other intervention, in the courts at home. Therefore an American naturally goes at once to the American consul when he has an affidavit to make which is to be used in a lawsuit at home or a deed to be executed and acknowledged. Those fees have heretofore been without any special limitation or regulation. They are not fees that regard foreigners; and I do not think foreigners could have occasion to pay those fees.

The new list of fees chargeable by consuls for various forms of notarial service is, I understand, taken from the laws of the District of Columbia. But the reason, as I understand, for making those fees no higher than they are here is that the man abroad who affixes the seal is already under a salary as an officer of the Government of the United States, whereas the man to whom you go in the District of Columbia with a deed, an affidavit, or other documents for verification or acknowledgment, is a man who gets no salary, but supports himself and receives no pay from the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But have not the committees of this House, in preparing legislation with reference to the salary or compensation of consuls, always taken into account the fact that they could earn other fees than those denominated official fees?

Mr. HITT. To answer that question truly, I must say that they have not or but partially. There are only a few posts in the world where the notarial fees amount to a considerable sum, say $2,500 and upward; and at a few they have been very large. The difference between the receipts at those few points and at others near at hand is astonishing, as between London and Manchester, where they are not one-tenth as great. In Paris I have known them, from information that I have reason to believe was true, to run up to $15,000 in a single year, in addition to the salary allowed the consul by law. In London they have been at one time more than that. In places of resort by Americans in Italy, like Genoa, Venice, and Milan, where it is supposed the great stream of American travel passes, and where you would suppose the nonofficial fees would be very large, they are insignificant. In Germany they are generally small. Even in that great center, Berlin, the sums received for this work last year were not considerable—only a little above $3,000, I am told. Except in the few great cities these notarial fees are so small it would surprise gentlemen who remember the comparative importance of those consulates as commercial posts; for instance, Chemnitz, Plauen, Mayence. Very few Americans are residents in Europe except at a few cities. The two great American colonies are at London and Paris. And then, of course, there are mercantile interests at Liverpool, Hamburg, Hongkong, Marseilles, and similar posts, and a small colony of business Americans at each.

Mr. DOCKERY. As this bill will not be voted upon to-night, but is to go over until to-morrow, I suggest, for the consideration of the eminent chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT], the preparation of a legislative provision which would cover into the Treasury of the United States the fees received by these consuls in excess of their compensation as fixed by law.

Mr. HITT. I do not know that I understand the gentleman perfectly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that some provision ought to be carried on this bill to cover into the Treasury the fees earned by these consuls in addition to their salary.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that if an amendment of that kind is to be prepared, he should prepare it himself. If he will take the pains to read the annual report of the Auditor for the State and other Departments he will find there published the amount of fees collected.

Now, while I am up, I wish to say a word in response to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. He made an inquiry this morning and again this afternoon in regard to a recent order issued by the State Department which I understood him to claim reduces the amounts that consuls are to receive hereafter, and he also asked this evening whether, in preparing this appropriation bill, we did not, when fixing the salaries of the consuls, take into account the amounts which they would collect in the way of fees. I have been a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for twelve years, and I want to say to him that when fixing the salaries of consuls in a bill of this kind I have never estimated what those gentlemen would receive in fees. A salary of $5,000 per annum is allowed to the consul at Paris and also to the consul at London. Efficient men can be obtained at that salary. The order which has been issued by the State Department is, as I understand, for the purpose of correcting certain abuses connected with the administration of consular positions. As the chairman of the committee said a while ago, this is an abuse which has been going on for a number of years. Various efforts have been made to correct this abuse, and I think that instead of criticising the Secretary of State for trying to correct it he ought to be applauded for his efforts in that direction.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not criticising the Secretary. I am in accord with him in his efforts to correct this abuse.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I approve his action. I think he deserves praise instead of censure.

There are, Mr. Chairman, only a few places where large amounts are reported to be collected by consuls in fees. When consuls collect large fees, outside of the regular fees, there is no report made of the amount collected. We have no means of ascertaining how much the consuls at Paris, or London, or Liverpool make per annum in this way. It is impossible to get the information, but there is a report issued, as I said before, by the Auditor for the State and other Departments, which shows the fees which are reported by the various consuls, and which go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HITT. If the Clerk will conclude the reading of the paragraph, I will move that the committee rise.

The Clerk resumed and continued the reading to and including line 3 of page 13.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10134, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment to permit me to ask unanimous consent?

Mr. PAYNE. I will withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1933) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine E. Lee.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, the name of Mrs. Catherine G. Lee, the daughter of William Rosser, a soldier of the Revolutionary war from the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who this Mr. William Rosser is?

Mr. TUCKER. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He himself was a soldier?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the Chair will submit some personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

BULLETIN ON THE COTTON PLANT.

Mr. GORMAN. From the Committee on Printing I report back a House concurrent resolution with sundry amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed and bound in cloth 6,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 33, United States Department of Agriculture, entitled The Cotton Plant: Its History, Botany, Chemistry, Culture, Enemies, and Uses; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "seven;" in line 7 to strike out "two" and insert "one," and after the word "thousand" to insert "two hundred;" in line 7 to strike out "four thousand" and insert "two thousand four hundred;" and at the end of the resolution to insert "and three thousand four hundred for the use of the Department of Agriculture;" so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed and bound in cloth 7,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 33, United States Department of Agriculture, entitled The Cotton Plant: Its History, Botany, Chemistry, Culture, Enemies, and Uses; of which 1,200 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,400 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but let it be read as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask to have the resolution read as amended.

The concurrent resolution was read as proposed to be amended; and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. I think we ought to have more copies of this document. The amendment seems to cut down the number of copies to be given to the Senate and to giye them to the Department of Agriculture. Requests for such documents usually come to the Senate and House. We shall be annoyed by letters when the supply of copies is exhausted, and we would have to have more printed. I would rather have the first number proposed for the Senate. My people are writing to me already for it.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senate passed a resolution and sent it to the House to print 20,000 copies of this bulletin, 6,000 for the Senate, 12,000 for the House of Representatives, and 2,000 for the Department of Agriculture. The House refused to concur and sent us a resolution providing for the printing of only 6,000 copies. We have amended it so as to make the number 7,000.

Mr. MILLS. How many copies for the Senate?

Mr. GORMAN. For the Senate 1,200, and for the House 2,400, and 3,400 for the Department. Let the resolution lie on the table if the Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. MILLS. I shall not object. I will let the committee go on with it. I would rather take the number proposed than nothing.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLS introduced a bill (S. 3636) to increase the pension of the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MILLS. This is a bill proposing to increase the pension of the 12 survivors of the war of 1812 to $30 a month. There are only 12 of them, and their ages range from 104 years, the oldest, to 93 years, the youngest. I ask the Committee on Pensions to act on the bill promptly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred, with the accompanying paper, to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3637) to authorize Maj. Gen. Alexander McD. McCook, United States Army, retired, and Capt. George Percival Scriven, United States Army, to accept medals presented to them by the Russian Government; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3638) for the relief of John Ward; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3639) for the relief of David Gibson, of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINDSAY introduced a bill (S. 3640) granting a pension to Cassius M. Clay, sr., a citizen of Kentucky and a major-general in the Army of the United States in the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 3641) authorizing the funding of indebtedness in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3642) for the erection of a public building at the city of Elgin, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the District appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHOUP submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

KILLING OF M. F. LOPEZ.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to send to the Senate any information that he may have in regard to the killing by Spanish soldiers of the son of M. F. Lopez, an American citizen, at Sagua la Grande, in Cuba, and any report or letter from the American consul at that point relating to the subject.

SYSTEM OF BIMETALLISM.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United States should not permanently acquiesce in the single gold standard, and that the efforts of the Government in all its branches should be steadily directed to secure and maintain the use of silver as well as gold as standard money, with the free coinage of both, under a system of bimetallism to be established through international agreement or with such safeguards of legislation as will insure the parity in value of the two metals at a fixed ratio, furnish a sufficient volume of metallic money, and give immunity to the world of trade from violent fluctuations in exchange.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall ask that the resolution be placed upon the table Calendar, in order that at an early day I may call it up and submit a few remarks thereon, which I hope may be in striking contrast to the speeches on Friday last by the gold monometallist, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], and the silver monometallist, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], who from opposite extremes joined hands in voting against the bill providing for another international bimetallic conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the table Calendar.

SALE OF LIQUORS IN CAPITOL BUILDING.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7083) to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there is a great misapprehension on the part of the public in relation to there being any saloons kept at either end of the Capitol, but it will save us a large amount of correspondence to have this bill acted upon. I may say that it is possible, of course, for Senators to order a bottle of wine or a glass of spirits in the Senate restaurant, but it is a very rare occurrence. However, the House having passed this bill, and deeming it necessary, I hope it will be passed.

Mr. HILL. When was the bill reported? I ask for information.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill was reported some days ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. January 28.

Mr. MORRILL. It is on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the bill was reported on the 28th of January.

Mr. HILL. I was not present at that date, and I was not aware until this moment that the bill had been reported. I desire to examine the bill, and I trust the Senator from Vermont will not press it this morning. I want to look at its provisions more carefully than I could do by hearing it discussed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the bill will go over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 1061, reported from the Committee on Pensions this morning. I intended to ask for its consideration when it was reported, but I was absent from the Chamber at the moment. It is a bill relating to some soldiers of the Mexican war who should have been placed upon the pension rolls years ago. Some of the same class were placed upon the pension rolls; others were left off by reason of a ruling afterwards made by the Commissioner of Pensions. It is a bill in regard to Gray's Battalion, reported by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] this morning. There is no objection to the bill in any form, and I should like to have it put on its passage.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if the routine morning business is over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has not yet been concluded.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that when that was done the Nicaragua Canal bill was to be taken up.

Mr. BERRY. I understood that the morning business was concluded. The Senator from Vermont was recognized to call up a bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had not so announced.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will not object to this bill. It will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from Arkansas to the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. I object to any unanimous consent until the routine morning business is over. When that is over, which I suppose will be in about two minutes, if the Senator shall renew his request, and he proves to be right in saying that the bill will only take two or three minutes, I shall not object to its consideration.

A bill (H. R. 6750) to authorize the mayor and city council of Monroe and the police jury of the parish of Ouachita, La., to construct a traffic bridge across the Ouachita River opposite said city.

SEAL ISLANDS OF ALASKA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is a matter on the table that I wish disposed of this morning, and it will take but a few moments.

On the 5th of January a resolution was passed by the Senate calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to report with regard to the destruction of the seals upon the seal islands of Alaska and the revenue of the Government derived therefrom. The report was received on the 23d of January, and it was printed and now lies on the table.

It appears from this report that since 1892 we have received no revenue whatever from the seal islands. It seems to me it is time that the matter should be disposed of in some way by the Senate. Under the conditions of the award made by the Paris Tribunal we preserve a zone 60 miles wide around those islands within which during certain months of the year seals should not be killed. It now appears that the seals feed upon the fish banks outside of this circle, and that the Canadians or any persons who choose to do so are allowed to go there and kill the seals at any time. The result is, according to this report, that last year 27,000 seals starved to death whose mothers had been butchered at sea by Canadian poachers.

A bill has passed the House of Representatives which will dispose of this whole matter. It provides that if England will not make proper provisions for preserving these seals and this seal life, then the United States shall kill all the seals that land upon those islands and stop this barbarous——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I desire to interpose to my friend what I have just interposed to the Senator from Arkansas. I promised that in two minutes I would yield to him, and I do not see that I can very well consent——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall be very glad to yield if I am out of order. I suppose that I am not. The matter is upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate as a part of the morning business a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. TELLER. I rise to morning business. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from South Dakota, who, I understand, has the floor, but I wish to submit a report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1654) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the birds and animals in the Yellowstone National Park, and to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes," to report it without amendment, and to submit a written report thereon.

I wanted to ask the Senate to consider the bill at the present time because it will take only a moment, but I do not like to interfere with the two or three Senators who seem to be entitled to the floor. However, if there is no objection, I will send the bill to the desk to be read, and ask that it be considered now. It will take only a moment, I think.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask for information whether the matter on the table to which I have called attention is in order after disposing of the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the morning business has not yet been concluded. When that is concluded, the Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from South Dakota. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for information.

The Secretary read Senate bill 1654.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CLARK. I could not exactly catch the provisions of the bill from the reading, and I should like to know from the Senator from Colorado exactly what it proposes.

Mr. TELLER. The bill proposes to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the United States courts of Wyoming and Montana, a part of the park being in one State and a part in the other.

Mr. CLARK. Is there a distinction made as to the place in which offenses over which either of the States has jurisdiction shall be tried? In other words, are the Montana courts given jurisdiction of offenses committed in Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator does not want to have the bill considered now, I, of course, will let it go over. I think the bill (and that I think is its merit) confers concurrent jurisdiction, no matter which court gets jurisdiction of the case first.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senator to let the bill go over a day, that I may examine it.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to let it go over. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will examine it, and if he has any suggestions to present in the way of amendments that he will be ready to present them.

Mr. CLARK. I will examine it.

Mr. TELLER. I send up the report, which I ask may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the report will be printed under the rule.

SALE OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 29th ultimo, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a master's, marshal, or any other judicial or execution sale of the properties of the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific railroad companies, or either of them, without additional legislation by Congress, would not be binding on the Government of the United States, or conclude it of any legal or equitable right therein now possessed, unless such sale should be subsequently ratified by Congressional action.

Mr. GEAR. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. GEAR. Unless the Senator wants——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, just a moment. There is another resolution, a Senate resolution, pending before the Senate and unacted upon, on which my colleague [Mr. THURSTON] desires to be heard. I do not know, but possibly he desires to be heard on both resolutions. I am not informed as to that matter, but as he is absent this morning, I will ask consent that the two resolutions be passed over, retaining their place until to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

GRAY'S BATTALION OF ARKANSAS VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. LODGE. If the morning business is concluded, I desire to call up the conference report on the immigration bill.

Mr. BERRY. I thought it was understood that when the morning business was concluded I would be recognized.

Mr. LODGE. I will not interfere with the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from Arkansas for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1061) granting pensions to Gray's Battalion of Arkansas Volunteers. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the names of all of the honorably discharged surviving officers and enlisted men of Gray's Battalion of Arkansas Volunteers, raised under the act of Congress of May 13, 1846, for service during the war with Mexico, and the names of surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men, subject to the limitations and regulations of the pension laws of the United States for pensioning the survivors of the war with Mexico.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPECULATION IN CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6834) to prevent the purchasing of or speculation in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. LINDSAY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HOAR, Mr. VILAS, and Mr. LINDSAY were appointed.

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LODGE. I now call up the conference report on the immigration bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill H. R. 7864, "An act to amend the immigration laws of the United States," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment, and agree to the House bill with amendments as follows:

Strike out in the first section all after the words "admission to the United States the following" and insert the following:

"All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language or the language of their native or resident country; but a person not so able to read and write who is over 50 years of age and is the parent or grandparent of a qualified immigrant over 21 years of age and capable of supporting such parent or grandparent may accompany such immigrant, or such a parent or grandparent may be sent for and come to join the family of a child or grandchild over 21 years of age, similarly qualified and capable."

Strike out the present section 2 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. For the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read and write, as required by the foregoing section, the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said language, and the immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made. Each immigrant shall be required to draw one of said slips from the box and read, and afterwards write out, in full view of the immigration officers, the words printed thereon. Each slip shall be returned to the box immediately after the test is finished, and the contents of the box shall be shaken up by an inspection officer before another drawing is made. No immigrant failing to read and write out the slip thus drawn by him shall be admitted, but he shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him, as now provided by law. The inspection officers shall keep in each box at all times a full number of said printed pasteboard slips, and in the case of each excluded immigrant shall keep a certified memorandum of the number of the slip which the said immigrant failed to read or copy out in writing. If in any case from any unavoidable cause the foregoing slips are not at hand for use, the inspection officers shall carefully and thoroughly test the ability of the immigrant to read and write, using the most appropriate and available means at their command; and shall state fully in writing the reasons why the slips are lacking, and describe the substitute method adopted for testing the ability of the immigrant."

Strike out the present section 3 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of March 3, 1893, to facilitate the enforcement of the immigration and contract-labor laws, shall apply to the persons mentioned in section 1 of this act."

Strike out present sections 4, 5, and 6, and insert as follows:

"SEC. 4. That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any male alien, who has not in good faith made his declaration before the proper court of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, to be employed on any public works of the United States, or to come regularly or habitually into the United States by land or water for the purpose of engaging in any mechanical trade or manual labor, for wages or salary, returning from time to time to a foreign country.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, company, or corporation knowingly to employ any alien coming into the United States in violation of the next preceding section of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the employment of sailors, deck hands, or other employees of vessels, or railroad train hands, such as conductors, engineers, brakemen, firemen, or baggagemen, whose duties require them to pass over the frontier to reach the termini of their runs, or to boatmen or guides on the lakes and rivers on the northern border of the United States.

"SEC. 6. That any violation of the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of this act by any alien or citizen shall be deemed a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for the term of not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That all persons convicted of a violation of section 4 of this act shall be deported to the country whence they came.

"SEC. 7. That notwithstanding the provisions of this or any other existing law, the Secretary of the Treasury may permit aliens to enter this country for the purpose of teaching new arts or industries under such rules and regulations as he may provide."

Add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 8. That this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba, during the continuance of the present disorders there, who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island."

Insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9. That any alien who shall, in violation of this act, or any other existing law, secure entry into the United States without inspection or examination, or through mistake, misrepresentation, collusion, deception, or fraud, may be taken into custody by the properly authorized immigration officers within thirty days after the facts become known to them; and such alien, upon a special inquiry at the most convenient place, conducted according to section 5 of the immigration act of March 3, 1893, shall be dealt with as provided by law for alien immigrants upon their first arrival."

Strike out the present section 7 and insert as follows:

"SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1897."

HENRY CABOT LODGE,
WM. E. CHANDLER,
CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

L. DANFORD,
STANYARNE WILSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], a member of the conference committee, please explain to the Senate wherein the bill as now presented by the conference report differs from the bill as it passed the Senate? It is quite difficult for me to understand precisely what the difference is, for I have not had time to examine the question.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. If I interfere with the Senator from Maryland I will withdraw my suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order upon the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States. The point of order which I make is that the conferees have transcended their authority and have added to the text of a clause in the bill which had been agreed to by both Houses of Congress, and they have, in addition thereto, further transcended their prerogative in having introduced new matter in the shape of three or four sections which has the unusual distinction of not having had a prior passage through either House. As I understand, the province and prerogative of conferees is to resolve the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. If that can not be done, it is the duty of the conferees to so report and to either ask for a further conference or to have the House to which the report is made recommit with instructions. Instead of that procedure, however, on the part of this committee, they have undertaken to legislate for the Senate and for the House of Representatives without giving the Senate or the House of Representatives the opportunity to determine, each for itself, with reference to that legislation. This report, therefore, not only violates a rule of the Senate, but violates the plainest rules of general parliamentary law.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him a question simply for my own information?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Will he kindly point out what new sections we have added which were not before us in the bill?

Mr. GIBSON. I will do so. I was proceeding to state the grounds of this point of order, and to verify the point of order in stating the new legislation, referring to that which has been added, as I primarily remarked.

On the 21st of May, 1896, the House of Representatives presented to the Senate a bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, all I wanted was simply the sections which he specified were newly added. I did not mean to draw him into a review of the bill.

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to proceed, I prefer to proceed in my own way.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I only wanted the Senator to furnish me the information for which I asked.

Mr. GIBSON. If I shall not have furnished the information before I have concluded, I shall be very glad to answer any question which the Senator may propound.

What is known as the House bill provided for an amendment of the immigration laws of the United States heretofore enacted by adding to the class of aliens to be excluded from admission to the United States all persons between 16 and 60 years of age who can not both read and write the English language or some other language. I will advert to that part of the report by way of illustration of the point which I shall proceed to make.

Later, in February, 1896, the Senate passed an immigration bill, substituting the Senate bill for the House bill to which I have just adverted. In the Senate bill there was a provision, in respect to the class of aliens to be excluded, providing that "all persons over 14 years of age who can not read and write the language of their native country or some other language" should be substituted for the provision of the House bill making the limit of age 16 years.

There was a further provision in the Senate bill which was substituted for the House bill for the purpose of testing the ability of immigrants to read and write. There was no such test of illiteracy in the House bill. In the Senate bill was the first time in the history of the amending of the immigration laws that the Senate provided a test of illiteracy for the qualification of alien immigrants. That illiteracy test, as I have just suggested, with reference to testing the ability of each immigrant, was as follows:

The inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing five lines of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type.

Then followed a further provision with reference to the keeping of boxes so as to conceal from view the slips to be read by the immigrant.

The Senate bill was amended by striking out the 14-year limit and applying 16 years as the limit. There was added an amendment, offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], that refugees from Cuba should be admitted into the United States without being subjected to the illiteracy test to which other alien immigrants were to be subjected.

That bill was passed by the Senate. Upon the passage of that bill a conference was asked by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the conferees on the part of the Senate were duly appointed, and also conferees were appointed on the part of the House. The result of that conference is, as I have stated in my point of order, that the conferees, instead of determining the differences between the Senate bill and the House bill, reporting that they had agreed and reporting the sections agreed upon, or reporting that the House had adhered and the Senate had receded or that the Senate had adhered and the House had receded, and presenting the result of that conference in the shape of a perfected bill which had before that time been passed upon by both Houses, have not done so; but, on the contrary, they sought—I speak it reverently—to accomplish by indirection what the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives had expressly determined against.

I now come to the points of difference to which the Senator from Massachusetts has called my attention. The conference report presents a very different immigration bill from that passed upon by the Senate and passed upon by the House of Representatives. Let us see whether I am correct or whether I am incorrect in that statement.

In the very first section of the conference report—and here is the suggestion I made—the conferees have added to what had already been agreed upon by both Houses. The Senate and the House had agreed upon the age limit; the Senate and the House had agreed as to the character of the reading and writing test; the Senate and the House had agreed that all persons over 16 years of age who can not read and write the language of their native country or some other language, except in the case of aged persons not able to read and write at all—a grandparent—should be admitted. The House had agreed that all male persons between 16 and 60 years of age who can not both read and write the English language or some other language should be excluded. The House and the Senate practically agreed to these conditions in this connection; yet we find the conferees in their wisdom, in the plenitude of the authority which it seems that they have arrogated to themselves or not—which remains to be seen—have added to and have changed what the House of Representatives and the Senate have suggested, without the House and the Senate having passed upon that question. They have provided that:

All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language or the language of their native or resident country.

Here is a provision to which I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts in answer to his inquiry made of me a moment since as to where a change has been made by the conferees.

The object of the immigration bill as passed by the Senate, and as passed by the House of Representatives, was to admit immigrants who could conform to the educational test. The conferees have gone outside of the authority with which they were invested by their respective Houses, and have added what the House and the Senate never before passed upon, and that is the prohibition entirely and absolutely of a class of immigrants who would have been admitted under the Senate bill and under the House bill. The explanation of that is to be found in the fact that there are thousands of immigrants eligible under the House bill and under the Senate bill who are ineligible under the conference report because of the fact that they have not a resident country and can not speak the language of their native country. Those are Russian Jews, the Slavs, the Hungarians, Mennonites, and thousands more of the different classes of immigrants that I might mention, who are intended to be admitted under the bill passed by both Houses, who are excluded by the conference report. I hope that point is clear, Mr. President.

I come to the other provisions where the conferees further transcended their authority. Under the bill substituted by the Senate for the House bill there was a provision that a man who could pass the illiteracy test should be permitted to send for his wife, if he had left her behind, or, if she had accompanied him and was illiterate herself, that she was admissible if he was; and yet, transcending the plain proposition on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House of Representatives, the conferees in their report have added to what the House of Representatives and the Senate had agreed upon by undertaking to separate man and wife and to commend the alien immigrant to the society of his grandfather rather than to that of his wife. They have excluded the wife and admitted the grandfather. The House of Representatives and the Senate passed no such bill, and yet the conferees, seeking by indirection, as I charge here, rather than by express legislation, have altered it by adding to what has been agreed upon by both Houses.

I come to the second proposition, as to the further point of order which I make in this connection, and that is that they more arrogantly—and I do not use the word reverently, either, in this connection—have sought to do by indirection what has never been undertaken by either House of Congress, and that was to add new sections to a bill.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Maryland for information regarding the point which he is making, whether I understood him correctly to say that, under the bill as it passed both the House and Senate, the illiterate wife might come in with the literate husband?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. And that under the bill as reported from the conference committee the illiterate wife is excluded?

Mr. GIBSON. She is.

Mr. GRAY. So that the literate husband alone may come?

Mr. GIBSON. The literate husband may come in, absolutely separating man and wife; and I pause in this connection to suggest that there have been times in the history of this fair land of ours when the separation of husband and wife in the days of slavery in the Southern States, by having the husband sold across the border, was inveighed against nowhere more strongly than by the representatives of the State from which the Senator who is one of the conferees comes—the State of Massachusetts—and yet in this enlightened period of our country's history, the separation, not of humble negroes who are in the relation of husband and wife, but of those of the same race as the Senator from Massachusetts, humble and alien though they may be, are to be separated, not by mere imaginary lines, the borders between States, but by oceans which roll 3,000 miles between them. The Senate never contemplated such a proposition as that sought to be brought in here by the conference committee.

The new section, Mr. President, to which the Senator from Massachusetts directs my attention in the conference report I will now proceed to refer to:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. 7864), "An act to amend the immigration laws of the United States," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
> That the Senate recede from its amendment, and agree to the House bill with amendments as follows.

Those amendments are to strike out in the first section all after the words "admission to the United States" and to insert the following:

> All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language or the language of their native or resident country.

That was the section to which I have before adverted, and I will not discuss it further. That was one of the recommendations of the committee of conference to which I have already referred. Then the committee report to strike out the present section 3 and insert a new section, as follows, confessedly a new section.

Mr. LODGE. What is that new section?

Mr. GIBSON. I read from the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. But what is the section?

Mr. GIBSON. Section 3.

Mr. LODGE. Is that not, as a matter of fact, the test which passed the Senate?

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir.

Mr. LODGE. What is section 3 in the conference report?

Mr. GIBSON. Section 3 changes the bill as it passed the Senate from the ability to read five lines of the Constitution to the ability to read from twenty to twenty-five words of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. That is, it reduces the test. That is very true.

Mr. GIBSON. It is a change, but I suppose the Senator will argue that it is germane to the general proposition.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator was not that section before the conference committee?

Mr. GIBSON. It was not before the Senate nor before the House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE. It was not before the House, but it was before the Senate. It is our section, modified by the House conferees.

Mr. GIBSON. The Senator from Massachusetts shall have full opportunity to present his view of the case——

Mr. LODGE. I shall.

Mr. GIBSON. Without any let or hindrance from the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I pass from the second section with the statement I have already made in this connection, and proceed to consider section 3. The language of the report of the committee of conference is to strike out section 3 and insert a new section, which is as follows:

> SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of March 3, 1893, to facilitate the enforcement of the immigration and contract-labor laws, shall apply to the persons mentioned in section 1 of this act.

This new section was never in the Senate bill and was never considered by the Senate.

I pass from that view of the case with the simple suggestion that the committee of conference has reported that as a new section, although I do not know——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GIBSON. For a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is usually very accurate, but this section is in the very language of the bill as it came from the other House.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not propose to comment upon it further than to suggest that the committee of conference have reported it as a new section.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not a new section, but simply a change of number. It is the exact section of the House bill.

Mr. GIBSON. I am not going to dwell on that feature of the point of order which I desire to make.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator deny that a committee of conference can change the numbering of the sections of a bill?

Mr. GIBSON. Oh, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is all they have done in this case.

Mr. GIBSON. The report of the committee of conference proceeds:

> Strike out present sections 4, 5, and 6 and insert as follows:
> "SEC. 4. That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any male alien who has not in good faith made his declaration before the proper court of his intention to become a citizen of the United States"—

Here the conferees, after the House and Senate had agreed upon a bill to admit alien immigrants coming in under the provisions of the illiteracy test, have added thereto that such alien must first declare—

> His intention to become a citizen of the United States, to be employed on any public works of the United States, or to come regularly or habitually into the United States by land or water for the purpose of engaging in any mechanical trade or manual labor, for wages or salary, returning from time to time to a foreign country.

Requiring in this new section that the "regularly and habitually" coming to the United States shall be determined by the courts as to what constitutes "regularly and habitually coming into the United States by land or water." In other words, it provides against what is known as "birds of passage" in the character of immigrants. Neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives had ever passed such a feature of this section; it had never been presented before the Senate or the House, and its presence here is due entirely to the report of the committee of conference.

Section 9 has been changed also by the committee of conference from that section of the House bill providing for violations of the act, and words have been inserted and clauses have been inserted in the section which were not in the section as contemplated by the Senate and by the House of Representatives.

Contenting myself, Mr. President, with pointing out, not in detail at this time, but generalizing and indicating at the same time in this general statement and verifying the point of order which I have made, I shall proceed now to argue whether or not the point of order is well taken.

Interference by committees of conference, Mr. President, from the very foundation of the institution of the Congress of the United States has been frowned upon as vicious and bad in its inception and in its consequences, and such a suggestion as a part of the unwritten law, and the written law as well, has so impressed itself upon committees of conference that there has rarely been a violation of that practice by such committees.

In the Forty-sixth Congress, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 4044, 4045, and 4047, a point of order was made against a resolution by a Representative, now a distinguished member of the Senate, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who, in the House of Representatives, submitted a resolution "that the conferees on the part of the House on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be, and are hereby, instructed to fix the salaries of the employees of the House," etc. Mr. Springer made the point of order that it was not in order to instruct the committee at that time, and the further point of order that the portion of the bill which the resolution proposed should be opened to consideration by the conference committee had been settled by the two Houses and should not be made the subject of conference. The Speaker, Mr. Randall, held that it was not within the power of a committee of conference to change a paragraph which had been agreed to by both Houses of Congress, for the reason that the conference was only on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, which necessarily excluded from their consideration any matter agreed upon by the two Houses. Mr. MILLS modified his resolution so as to meet this objection, but the further point of order was made by Mr. Robinson that the resolution as modified proposed to instruct the conferees to change what the two Houses had agreed upon, and was not in order. The Speaker sustained the point of order, and the resolution as modified was not received. The Speaker, Mr. Randall, decided that it was not in order to instruct the committee of conference to consider a subject on which both Houses had agreed.

I have further references to decisions in the Thirtieth Congress, in the Thirty-eighth Congress, and in the Fortieth Congress bearing upon the same point. I will not weary the Senate by reading them, but they can be verified by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I have at my desk, if the point should be disputed. But I proceed to call the attention of the Senate to a very strong case reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the Forty-second Congress, first session. In the Congress to which I have referred, when Mr. Colfax was speaker, if I am not mistaken, and if he was not I shall be glad to be corrected, Judge Holman, then a member of Congress, raised a point of order on a conference report upon an appropriation bill. He said in the point of order that the committee of conference was not authorized to consider matters which have never been incorporated in Senate amendments nor brought before the House.

There are—

He said—

incorporated in this report two propositions which, so far as I am informed, have never been before the House or Senate; one is the provision making appropriations for the Sutro tunnel, and the other the provision for the Agricultural Department. I submit that these matters—were never referred to the committee of conference at all.

Judge Holman further said—

Not referred to the committee of conference at all, because they had not been considered by either House of Congress.

Mr. Dawes, who was afterwards a member of this distinguished body, said:

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the rule to be so broad as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] states it.

The Speaker, Mr. Colfax, replied:

The rule is as broad as the gentleman from Indiana states it.

Mr. Wood, following the line of Judge Holman's point of order which he had so tersely stated, adds by way of inquiry:

There is nothing in the bill referring to that subject in any way; and the committee of conference has no right to consider anything not in disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. Dawes suggested, by way of reconciling the apparent discrepancy in the two statements, that the Sutro tunnel mentioned in the appropriation bill and the Carson City mint covered the whole ground, that there was a connection between the two, when Mr. Brooks, of New York, said "the Sutro tunnel and the Carson City mint are a considerable distance apart. It seems to me," as he added, "that it requires a very long string to attach one to the other."

The House refused to pass the appropriation, and the Senate never consented at all, presenting absolutely a parallel case to the one now before the Senate.

Judge Holman, following his first suggestion, said:

I object not so much to the appropriation as to the principle involved. It is to the introduction into conference reports of entirely new legislation by conference committees to which I object.

Then Mr. Garfield, afterwards a member of this body and President of the United States, said:

Will not the effect at least be this: That hereafter, when anybody wants anything to be put through, he will endeavor to get it introduced in such a delicate situation as this, so as to secure favorable action upon it?

That is, to have a report upon it by a conference committee, asking no legislation at the hands of the Senate or the House. Mr. Garfield said that would be all he would have to do if the principle should not be maintained that was contended for in this instance under the point of order. There would be no use for the Senate or for the House of Representatives. All a man would have to do would be to get a report from the committee of conference. All that would be necessary would be to have them report a subject never passed upon in either House. This absolutely and unqualifiedly has been done in this instance. If the rule is to be adopted that the conference report shall be accepted and received as representing the views of the House and the Senate, then do away hereafter with the tedious processes oftentimes of legislation which have had to be resorted to in Congress.

The question of order raised by Judge Holman was submitted to the House and sustained by a vote of yeas 82, nays 33. Then the Speaker added, by way of emphasizing the vote, that the conference report must be sustained or rejected as a whole, which is important in this connection.

Mr. Randall then suggested:

I think the House should put its foot down and say that a conference committee has not a right to insert original matter in the bill.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, concluding the debate, said:

I desire to be understood clearly in this matter. I thought this an opportune occasion for us to make a determination in regard to this improper procedure. I regarded no question as more important for the consideration of this House than that which forbids the introduction of new legislation in reports of committees of conference.

That, Mr. President, is one of the strongest cases. There is another instance, where the House had under consideration the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill. Mr. Fernando Wood raised the question of order on the report, whether it was competent for a committee of conference between the two Houses to put into the bill any other subjects-matter than the subjects-matter considered by one of the Houses in connection with the bill. Mr. Blaine, the Speaker, said that if the facts were as the gentleman from New York, Mr. Wood, supposed, the point of order would be made very clear. He then went on to discriminate, pointing out that some features of the bill did not present themselves as being exactly as Mr. Wood stated. But he enunciated the rule as being broad enough, and not only broad enough, but as embracing in every instance the substance of the point of order which had been submitted.

Now, Mr. President, there is another decision in this connection on the same point. The Speaker decided in a case in the Forty-sixth Congress, third session, that a resolution was not in order to submit to a conference committee any subject not originally committed to them. There is another decision on the same point, emphasizing, in the decision by Mr. Blaine, a decision which had been previously rendered, to which I have adverted. The Speaker decided that it was not in order to instruct the conferees on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill on a subject not submitted to them or in disagreement between the two Houses.

That is all I propose to submit in the line of decisions in the House of Representatives, but I will conclude my presentation of the point of order with a decision in the Senate on this question. It is to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Fiftieth Congress, first session.

This was an instance of an appropriation bill, where the committee of conference had added an item of $15,000 which in the judgment of the committee was proper to be added, but without authority from the Senate or the House of Representatives to make this appropriation. It was not contemplated in the reference of the bill to the committee; it was never thought of, and yet the committee of conference said that they found, after the bill had been committed to the committee of conference, although not contemplated originally by the Senate and the House, that it was proper to insert the item of $15,000. Let us see what Judge Edmunds says, and the point of order which he made in that connection:

I make the point of order that this report is irregular in changing the text of a clause that had already been agreed upon by the two Houses. It has been stated by the chairman of our conference with great candor that the conferees have changed the text of the bill in points and in respects that both Houses had already agreed upon, and where nothing was left open for action by the committees of conference.

They said so, and gave a reason why it was proper that the item of $15,000 should be reported as a part of the bill. Senator Plumb, who had charge of the conference report, argued against the point of order. The President pro tempore, Senator Ingalls, passed upon the point of order in the following language:

The Chair has no doubt upon the question of order, arising not under the rules of the Senate, but under general parliamentary law, that committees of conference can not alter a part of the bill to which both Houses have agreed. So if the report shows that upon a proposition or amendment to which both Houses had agreed, and which therefore was not left open, the conferees added words—

Added "words," not whole sections, not whole clauses, not paragraphs, but "words," simply, to what had been agreed upon by both Houses they had no business to do it—

it would not be according to the general parliamentary practice. The Chair thinks, however, that it is for the Senate to decide whether they will or will not agree to the report of the committee of conference.

The Senate did decide it. The vote is given, deciding the point of order as well taken.

After the President pro tempore, Mr. Ingalls, had said, "The Chair submits the question whether the report is in order," Judge Edmunds further said:

I do not need to go into any discussion with the Chair, because that is a right the Chair has, and the Chair's views are clear and perfectly correct; but I wish to take the judgment of the Senate upon it as a precedent—

"As a precedent," and that precedent has never been departed from from that day to this save in the instance which is now under consideration—and if the judgment of the Senate corresponds with the clear parliamentary law and the clear safety that we ought to guard in respect to these bills, I shall then, if I may, waive my point of order.

Calling attention to the strict regard which ought to be had to preserving the character of conference reports.

Then the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who was one of the members of the conference committee at the time, argued against the views which Judge Edmunds maintained, and said the point of order was not well taken. Judge Edmunds in conclusion said:

The Senator is mistaken. The committee of conference has made no report asking unanimous consent.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] argued that the point of order was not well taken because the conference committee had come into the Senate and asked unanimous consent to put in the $15,000 appropriation, and it was conceded that if unanimous consent had been asked it would have been accorded, so evident was the commendable purpose for which the appropriation was asked. With these facts staring the Senate in the face, and with the suggestions so tersely presented by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], it was denied. Judge Edmunds added:

The Senator is mistaken. The committee of conference has made no report asking unanimous consent. It has only stated in its report, when you take the report and read the bill with it, that it has changed a part of the bill that both Houses had already agreed upon. Then the Senator making the report asked unanimous consent, stating, with the candor which characterizes him, that they had transgressed the rule, and therefore unanimous consent was necessary. I made the point of order in order to test the sense of the Senate, the first time it has been called to such a question for five or six years. It was then called to it, and the report was declined to be received, and the conferees left that part out in order that the Senate might not in the Journal appear to have recognized this irregularity, and then, as far as I am concerned, it will be waived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the point of order raised by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] upon the report of the committee of conference, whether, having changed an amendment that had been agreed to by both Houses, the report of the committee is in order. Senators in the affirmative will say "aye;" the negative, "no." [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it.

Now, Mr. President, having stated the point of order, and, in my judgment, having verified it by the authorities to which I have referred, I respectfully submit it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall waste very little time over the point of order. The powers of conference committees have been the subject of a great deal of debate first and last in both Houses. The principles in regard to them are pretty well established, and if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] had given as much attention to reading the House and Senate bills which were before the conference committee as he has to the extracts which he has read so fluently and so eloquently to the Senate, I think he would have been less disturbed about our exceeding our powers in this instance.

We have seen, not once, but many times, a tariff bill which has passed both Houses go into a conference and come out a new bill in all its essential provisions, and the action was defended and sustained on the ground which has been mentioned in several of the extracts furnished us by the Senator from Maryland—that the subject-matter of the bill was all before the conference for any changes they desired to make. The entire subject-matter of the restriction of immigration by an illiteracy test was before the committee of conference, and so also there was before the committee of conference the entire subject of the exclusion of aliens who come habitually to this country and return to another, taking up no residence here. That was embodied in what is known as the Corliss amendment, which, as part of the House bill, was before the committee.

Mr. President, the differences between the two Houses in regard to the first section were differences of phraseology. They were differences of terms, and the terms which result from the conference represent the compromise between the two Houses, which it is the object of a conference committee to bring about. There is nothing in the conference report in the way of subject-matter that was not absolutely before the conference committee.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question, or would he prefer to go on?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I will yield. I shall be very glad to hear what the Senator from Maryland has to say.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate whether it is not a fact that they have changed by the conference report a material provision of the bill that was acted upon by both Houses of Congress?

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to have the Senator point it out.

Mr. GORMAN. As the bill came to us from the House, in the first section, line 7, it provides that "all male persons between 16 and 60 years of age who can not both read and write the English language or some other language" shall be excluded. The Senate considered that clause and adopted the language that "all persons over 16 years of age who can not read and write the language of their native country or some other language" shall be excluded, using the same phrase that was in the bill as passed by the House, and then making a specific provision as to "wife," which was really included in the word "male" in the seventh line of the bill as passed by the House. The conferees have changed those two important provisions as agreed upon by the Houses.

Mr. LODGE. I am surprised that the Senator from Maryland, with his great experience in conference committees, should ask me that question. The word "male" was put in in the House. It was omitted in the Senate. The language of the House bill, "the English language or some other language," differed entirely from the Senate bill, which was "native country or some other language." Between those conflicting phrases we arrived at the compromise phrase; but I will say to the Senator from Maryland that the phrase "resident country," which makes the change, was put in at the suggestion of the gentleman on the conference who takes the same view of the subject that he does. It was put in to liberalize the bill, and in that respect, let me say, I think the committee acted absolutely within their power. The whole subject-matter of the restriction of immigration by an illiteracy test was before them.

Mr. GORMAN. No; but on the point I make I should like to hear the Senator from Massachusetts, for in my experience here I have never known of a change so radical made in a conference report. Both Houses of Congress have agreed that the persons coming to us shall speak the language of their native country, or adopted country, or some other language. The clause "some other language" was put in by both Houses of Congress to cover a great number of desirable people who come to this country. The conference committee changed that language, adopted by both Houses, which is material to the bill; and I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not believe he can find a single instance in the case of conference reports where a material subject was changed by a conference report after having been agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. LODGE. I can not agree with the Senator from Maryland on that point. I think the conference committee acted very well within the powers of conference committees. I never have heard it suggested that when a subject was thrown into conference, with clauses directed to accomplish the same end in both bills, but varying in form, it was not within the power of the conference committee to take those two propositions from the different Houses and put them into a new draft by way of compromise on which the two Houses could agree.

Mr. GRAY. Will it interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts to ask him a question in the course of his argument?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to know whether the effect of the change made by the conference committee in the language of the bill as passed by both Houses would have the effect attributed to it by the junior Senator from Maryland—to prohibit the immigration absolutely of a large class of persons who, by the text of the bill framed in each House, would have been admitted upon the reading and writing test?

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that I was coming to that in a moment.

Mr. GRAY. Very well. I do not want to anticipate the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I simply wanted to pass very briefly over the technical objection that had been made, and then I intend to discuss the merits of the report and take up the specific point which the Senator has now offered.

Mr. GRAY. The reason I asked was because if that were so it would seem to apply to what the Senator calls the technical objection that is being made, to wit, whether the conference report has added any substantially new legislation to what has been passed upon by either House.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to make a suggestion right there?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I make it simply for the purpose of elucidating this matter, if I can. The House provision, as I understand it, originally was that all male persons over 16 years of age who can not read and write the language of their native country——

Mr. LODGE. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. The House provision applied to all male persons between 16 and 60 years of age.

Mr. HILL. I am stating it simply as to the ages. It applied to all male persons of certain ages who can not read and write the language of their native country or some other language. That was a distinct proposition of itself, rather independent of all that followed. Then the Senate comes in and strikes out the word "male" and changes the ages, but leaves the rest of it exactly as it was. Now, when the only question at issue was the question of male persons and the age, can the conference committee come in and strike out the words "or some other language" and insert an entirely new provision, namely, of the resident country? That is the point involved.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will observe that the language provisions are not the same in the two bills. The words "some other language" are in both bills, but the provision in regard to language, over which, in my judgment, the conference committee had complete jurisdiction as part of the subject-matter of the conference, was in one bill "the English or some other language," in the other bill "the native country or some other language." The only portion that was the same in both were the words "some other language." That point I will explain when I come to it. I did not want to be interrupted on what I was saying about the question of order with a question on the merits of the bill; but I think the change in that sentence in regard to the language provision opened the clause entirely to the conference committee to act upon and to put in a completely new draft if they so saw fit, because it was different in both Houses. If you separate the language provision from the provisions as to age and sex——

Mr. HILL. If the Senator has the bill as passed by the House before him, I wish he would read——

Mr. LODGE. I have the bill before me.

Mr. HILL. Will you read those four or five lines?

Mr. LODGE. The clause reads as follows:

All male persons between 16 and 60 years of age who can not read and write the English language or some other language.

The Senate differed on the word "male." They left it out in the bill as passed by the Senate. The Senate differed as to the age. They applied the provision to all persons over 16 years of age, putting no age limit. That threw the whole question of the sex and the age upon two amendments into conference. In the same way the difference between "English language" and "native country," in my judgment, opened that line to amendment in conference.

But I put it on the broader ground, which is that the whole subject-matter of the restriction of immigration by an illiteracy test was open to the action of the conference committee, and that the conference committee has not only not gone beyond its powers, but it has not gone so far as many conference committees go and have a right to go.

Mr. President, I do not desire to dwell further on the question of the point of order.

Mr. HILL. Right there, if I do not annoy the Senator, let me call attention to section 9.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. HILL. Section 9 of the conference committee bill, if I may so speak of it, makes an entirely new provision. To what is that germane?

Mr. LODGE. That section was put in without objection on the part of the conferees of either House, with the understanding that it was absolutely necessary for carrying out the preceding sections. It is not in the least essential to the principle or subject-matter of the bill, except as a method for providing against fraud practiced under the law. That is all. It is in its nature a penal section; that is all.

Mr. HILL. The mere fact, of course, that it was agreed to by the conference without objection does not change it.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not mean to make that point.

Mr. HILL. It strikes me that section 9 is clearly outside of the province of the conference committee. It may be a very proper limit or it may not be. I will submit my views upon that question later. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator's point. I did not mean that the question whether the conference committee agreed to or did not agree to this section among themselves was of any consequence to the argument. It was put in by the conference committee because it seemed absolutely necessary to carry out the other sections as they had been made, and they deemed it within their power to do that.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will permit me to say that I am inclined to think, from a hasty examination of it now, that he is right as to his contention in regard to the amendment which the Senator from Maryland calls attention to; but I do think that section 9 and a portion of another section are entirely foreign to the questions involved in the conference.

Mr. LODGE. I do not in the least deny that section 9 is a new section. It is the only new section in the bill, I will say.

Mr. GRAY. While the Senator has before him——

Mr. LODGE. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon.

Mr. LODGE. We regarded it, as I have stated, merely as a necessary part of the bill—that is, that it was absolutely essential to have some method provided to give sanction and enforcement to the provisions in the bill. It connected itself principally with the Corliss amendment, so called, which was a House provision which the Senate struck out entirely, as the Senator will remember. When the Senate conferees receded and accepted that provision in a modified form, they thought it necessary to add this in the nature of an amendment to the Corliss amendment, in order to secure its being properly carried out if it was to go upon the bill. I think, although it is strictly speaking a new section, that it is perfectly within the powers of the conference committee engaged in perfecting that legislation.

Mr. HILL. It is a new section and a new subject-matter.

Mr. LODGE. I differ with the Senator about its being new subject-matter. I think it is absolutely a part of the subject-matter of the Corliss amendment, which the Senator will remember was entirely before the committee, although the Senate had stricken it out; as a part of the House bill, it of course was before the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. I trust I may be permitted to finish what I am saying. I hope the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will allow me to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. MORGAN. The question which is before the Senate is a question of privilege which I have no right, of course, to displace in virtue of any objection that I might see proper to make to it. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to go on.

Mr. NELSON. What is the Senator's request?

Mr. MORGAN. In view of the anxiety of his colleague to force the bankruptcy bill to a hearing, of course he must do so. I have no right to object.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that if he will allow me to finish the remarks that I am now making I shall certainly not press the conference report against his bill, the great importance of which I appreciate, and also that it is now blocking a great deal of other important legislation in the Senate; but I should like, as I have started, to finish what I have to say on the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a matter of allowance addressed to me at all. I have no right to object; but I would not, if I had the privilege of objecting, be so discourteous as to decline to yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, I think, has a right to object. I think his bill comes up as the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. The conference report is privileged.

Mr. HILL. I hardly want to acquiesce in the propriety of that suggestion. The conference report, like everything else, is subject to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, everything is subject to it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Alabama has really a strict right to go ahead.

Mr. LODGE. Everything is subject to the question of consideration, but I do not want to interfere with the Nicaragua Canal bill. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me to finish what I have to say, which will take but a few moments, I shall be much indebted to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me a word on this precise point?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Alabama if he has a suggestion to make about going on. I understand, however, that the conference report is a privileged question, and I do not understand the Senator from Massachusetts to surrender its privilege.

Mr. LODGE. I do not surrender its privilege at all, but I do not wish to use it to shut out the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator was not distinctly understood on that point. He means for the time being.

Mr. LODGE. For the time being, of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say a word in reference to section 9, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think any Senator will contend that a conference committee can not insert a proper penal clause. They get together and confer as to the immigration prohibition of one kind and another, and when they have adjusted all differences between them they insert an appropriate penal clause punishing offenses against the act, which takes the place of a prior penal clause that was before the conference committee. I understand that that is entirely within the province of a conference committee, and that the proposition can not possibly be gainsaid according to any principle of parliamentary law of which I ever heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Minnesota to rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of objecting to any delay in this matter, and having either the immigration bill, the Nicaragua bill, or any other bill to take up the time of the bankruptcy bill.

If the Senate will bear with me a few moments, I wish to make a brief statement that I was not permitted to make the other day. The country during the last four years has been in the midst of the hardest and most distressing times we have had in the memory of the oldest citizen. The people need help. There are three modes, in three directions in which we can help them by means of legislation, as I conceive. One is through tariff legislation; another through currency legislation; and the third by the enactment of a suitable bankruptcy law.

As to the two first methods, that of tariff and that of currency legislation, we can not proceed at this session. That kind of legislation moves on party lines and involves party questions, and it is hopeless to attempt to do anything in that direction at this time and under these conditions. But the subject-matter of bankruptcy legislation is not a party question. It is a matter that goes to relieve all the people of this country. It is a practical question. The people of this country in their distressed condition to-day care little about the question of Cuba; they care little about the Nicaragua Canal; they care little about an Hawaiian cable; they care very little whether a few Canadians come across the line and work on this side of the line without declaring their intention to become citizens. But the people of this country who have been financially wrecked and stranded in the midst of these hard times come before the American Congress and they ask this measure of relief at the present time that those who have been unfortunate, that those who are unable to pay their debts, shall not be handicapped and loaded down with millstones around their necks, but shall have such legislation at this time as will give them a clearance and an opportunity to start in the world anew, and thus recuperate themselves and their surroundings, instead of remaining inert under the shadows of the debts which overhang them.

Mr. President, in the midst of these hard times there is no occasion to put more vigorous or stronger and more drastic weapons in the hands of the creditors. We do not need at this particular time any such remedial legislation.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Did the Senator from Massachusetts yield the floor or did he not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts to yield the floor.

Mr. HILL. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Minnesota to rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NELSON. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair recognized the Senator from Minnesota to make a point of order, which I understand he is making.

Mr. HILL. It is too brief.

Mr. NELSON. I am making my point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is listening to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I was about to say that in the midst of these hard times to arm and equip the creditors with a further weapon of collecting their debts is wholly unnecessary. They have our existing State laws and our Federal laws for the collection of their debts. What the people want now first of all, in the midst of these hard times and in this emergency, is a voluntary bankruptcy law which will enable them to start life anew and to build themselves up again. In most cases men upon whom better fortunes shine under such conditions will be disposed to treat the debts of which they have obtained technical legal acquittance as debts of honor, and will be ready to pay them, and will have the requisite means for that purpose at their command.

Mr. President, if the present Congress expires without passing suitable bankruptcy legislation, the people of this country will feel that when they have asked for bread we have given them a stone. I trust that neither Cuba, nor the Nicaragua Canal, nor the Hawaiian cable, nor this matter of regulating immigration, will stand in the way of this question of relief that is demanded by the people in the shape of bankruptcy legislation. Every mail and every day I get letters and telegrams on this subject.

These bankruptcy bills were reported last March, if I remember aright. They have been on the Calendar ever since. We have not more than a month left of this Congress, and I trust that we will all unite in giving the people the necessary relief in the way of bankruptcy legislation.

In what I have said I do not in any manner intend to reflect in the least upon the action of the committee that has the matter in charge. I have simply voiced the sentiment, the crying demand, the earnest prayer, of my people. I heard a remark the other day, made as a suggestion to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. HILL. I make the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the Senator from New York will have patience. We have been very patient with him. We have listened to him by the hour upon District of Columbia affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Maine the other day made the statement that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a point of order, and insist upon an opportunity to state it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Minnesota that his remarks were being made by the unanimous consent of the Senate, and objection being interposed at this time, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. NELSON. Very well, then; I will come to the point of order, Mr. President. [Laughter.] Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me on the point of order?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can make a parliamentary point of order at any time without requesting me to yield. I had the floor to finish some remarks. The Senator rose to a point of order and he has been making a speech on the bankruptcy bill, in which I am in entire sympathy, but I shall be very much obliged if he will allow me to conclude what I wish to say.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me one minute more? Then I will cease.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I was about to say, and with that I will close, that the Senator from Maine insinuated the other day that the steering committee had not given the proposed bankruptcy legislation the right of way. Mr. President, there is a steering committee bigger than the six or eight Senators who meet in the Marble Room. It is the steering committee of the American people who come here and demand this legislation, and I trust nobody will allow it to be side tracked at this session of Congress.

This is my point of order, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Now that the Senator from Minnesota has concluded the statement of his point of order, I will continue with the remarks that I started to make.

I do not agree with the Senator from Minnesota that this is a petty measure. Great as is the interest which I feel in the bankruptcy bill, and anxious as I am to see it pass, I think a question which affects the citizenship and the labor of the United States is quite as important as the question as to how the American people shall collect their debts. The importance of this measure, to my mind, is very great, as great as any measure in its future effects that can come before Congress.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate, without any reference now to the technical objections that have been raised to the conference report, to the substance of that report.

The first two sections include the illiteracy test and the method of applying that test. The rest of the bill is the Corliss amendment, so called. That amendment, as it came to the Senate, seemed to your Committee on Immigration impracticable and likely to lead to great hardship and injustice in the form in which it was put. They had grave doubts as to whether it could be put in a practicable form or not. They struck it out, and the Senate agreed with them in that amendment.

Of course the entire body of the Corliss amendment was then open to consideration in the conference committee, and the committee devoted many hours to the consideration of this amendment and of the principles which it involved. The House members were very reluctant to yield upon it, and the Senate members were equally unwilling to recede. At last they agreed upon the form which is now presented in the report, which we felt would reach in some measure the evils which now exist, and, at the same time, would not lead to any injustice.

There are two points involved in the Corliss amendment. They are all in the first section of that amendment, which in this bill is section 4, although section 3 is a part of the Corliss amendment simply in a changed order. Section 4 contains the whole substance of the amendment. The rest of the clauses are merely the exceptions to the effect of the law and the methods by which it shall be carried out.

There seems to have been a widely spread idea that the Corliss amendment was aimed simply at the small number of aliens who come over the border from Canada to work in some of our northernmost States. That is not at all its main purpose. It has a much wider scope and intention than that. It provides, in the first place, that only citizens of the United States, or those who shall have declared their intention of becoming citizens in the ordinary legal method, shall be employed on the public works of the United States. I have been informed by an inspector of immigration on the Lakes that in one day in last December $4,000 were paid in wages by one firm of contractors to aliens and $2,700 by another. I use that merely as an example of the evil which it is proposed to reach.

I believe, Mr. President, that the money taken from the taxpayers of the country and paid out by the Government should be paid back to the taxpayers and not to those who bear no part of the burdens and have no share in the citizenship of the United States. The public money, when it is spent, should be spent among the people who furnish that public money. I do not believe that that is a proposition that can be successfully controverted.

The other proposition embodied in section 4, which has the substance of the Corliss amendment, is that persons who make a practice of coming back and forth to this country, who come here for a few months, earn their wages at lower rates than ours, and then leave the country, taking their money with them, shall, if it can be proved to be habitual, be prevented from doing so, and that corporations, railroads, etc., shall be prevented from employing them.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. When the aliens go back with their pockets full of the money they earn here, do they not leave behind them the work they have done? They do not steal the money.

Mr. LODGE. I will take that up in a moment.

These men are employed here; they come to the country, as I have said, and go out of it, contributing nothing to its support; paying no taxes, and carrying with them the money they have earned. The work to which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] refers, in my judgment, can be as well done by American citizens and taxpayers as by aliens.

Mr. HILL rose.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to go on if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HILL. The Senator is speaking very ably in favor of this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking of the Corliss amendment, if the Senator will allow me to conclude.

Mr. HILL. I want to add that I have not heard any objection made to that particular amendment by anyone in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I know; but if the Senator will permit me, I should like to state the view of the committee and what it has reported, which I am trying to do in my own way.

Mr. HILL. The Senator can take his own course; I wish him to do so; but I was simply going to call attention to the fact that I have heard no opposition to that amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I admit that, but I think it only proper that the chairman of the committee of conference on a conference report should be permitted to state to the Senate exactly what the conferees have done, and exactly what the meaning of their bill is; and thus I have come to the second part of the Corliss amendment, which relates to the general employment of aliens in the United States.

Unless Senators have investigated that question, I do not believe they realize how great that evil is. The coming over the Canadian border is as nothing. If you will turn to the report of one of the Commissioners of Immigration, who went abroad when that Commission was sent to Europe some years ago, you will find that in one year the number of returning immigrants, in 1889, for example, was 111,000. There are thousands of men, chiefly from Italy, some from Poland, who come here, work on different kinds of work during the summer, and go back in the autumn to their own countries, carrying their wages with them. They buy return tickets at a very low price. I have seen it estimated in different reports from the Department that the number of these coming and returning laborers from Italy alone has risen as high as 30,000, and seldom falls below 10,000. Every dollar they earn they take out of the country. They come here and live in the poorest way. Let me read just a brief extract from one of our consuls, Dr. Starkloff, at Bremen. He says:

> I have already reason to suspect that a great many people, especially Bohemians, Polanders, and Hungarians, are engaged under contract by mining companies, mostly of Pennsylvania. Since I have taken charge of this consulate I have noticed that these people are shipped for the United States in the spring and return in the autumn. I have recognized the same faces, especially those of the men under whose supervision they seem to travel. These people do not handle any money, nor do they answer any questions to strangers, no matter in what language they are addressed. They seem to follow their leader blindly. There is but one woman to each crew of 12 or 13 men, who, as I am informed, works and cooks for such at their place of destination in the United States.

By that means the contract-labor laws which we have placed upon our statute book have been made an absolute nullity. These men come in that way in the spring and return in the autumn. It is a great evil. It is the very evil that the contract-labor laws, which no man would think of repealing, were aimed to cure and which they have totally failed to remedy.

Mr. President, I think the same principle which applies to the employment of aliens on public works applies to the employment of aliens in this way. These "birds of passage," as they are called, take just so much labor, and at lower rates, from the citizens of the United States, who pay taxes and contribute to the support of the Government. When we are told that we have 2,000,000 unemployed, it seems to me that charity, and justice also, certainly in that case, should begin at home.

I pass to the remaining part of the bill. Section 2 the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] described as a new section, where we had gone beyond our powers, although it is the exact section which passed the Senate. The House bill had no such section, and the whole section was open to the consideration of the conferees. There was only one change of importance made in it, and that was the change to which the Senator from Maryland alluded. In that change we reduced the amount that these immigrants were required to read, and the Senator from Maryland seems to think that that is an objection to the clause. I shall not dwell upon that clause. It has been agreed to by both Houses, and it has not been seriously contested, that if we are to have an illiteracy test, this method of applying the test, which has had long trial in some of our States, is a fair and proper means of doing it.

Now, I come to the first paragraph upon which the contest has chiefly turned. What we desire in the language clause, which has been especially discussed, was to get a provision which would admit anybody who could read or write any living language. We could think of no better phrase than the one "native or resident country." The proposition that the German Mennonites, or the natives of Liefland and Courland, the German provinces of Russia, or the French of Alsace and Lorraine could not be admitted to this country because in the one case they could not read Russian and in the other case they could not read or write German is perfectly idle. They speak the language of the country where they reside. That is the interpretation intended by the committee, and that is why the enlargement was made.

We have been told—and I received a letter from a gentleman whom I understand is the agent of the Hirsch fund, which is engaged in transporting Russian Jews to the United States—that this clause discriminated against the Russian Jews. It was not the intention of the committee to discriminate against any race or any creed. But I have been informed that that clause affects them because they read and write Hebrew and no other language. I have been informed since that the language which they write and read is not the pure Hebrew, but a species of dialect or patois, which I think would come within the phrase of "a resident country;" but the only class of people who by any ingenuity of interpretation can be brought under that are people who can read and write no language but a dead language, and I think the number of persons who can read and write Latin or ancient Greek, or who understand the Egyptian hieroglyphs, or who are able to read or write the language of the Old Testament, and who nevertheless can read or write no other tongue, is so small that it is hardly necessary to warp our legislation in order to cover their case.

Now I come to what has been considered——

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator understand that the words in the amendment "or resident country" are an enlargement or a restriction of the language previously used, "or some other language"?

Mr. LODGE. We understood that we were enlarging it and making it in the safest way. We wanted to get it fair, so that anybody who spoke a living tongue known in any province, or any country, any place where the resident dialect or patois, whatever it was, could come in.

Mr. HILL. If that was the idea, if you wished to take that broad, liberal view which you now say you did, why did you not put it "or some other language"? That would have been clear.

Mr. LODGE. Because it appeared to the committee that this was clearer and better than putting it in that way.

Mr. HILL. I do not see how that is.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from New York will kindly let me finish, I will say merely that I have tried to discuss the point as I understand it. I only wish to add in conclusion, on the point that has been raised, that there are seventeen languages spoken in the Empire of Austria-Hungary. Only two are official. No one thought for one moment of excluding the other fifteen. If this patois or dialect of the Russian Jews is spoken among them in Russia, I take it they could come in under it as the language of their "resident country."

The other portion of the bill, which undoubtedly was open to change in regard to the sexes and in regard to the exceptions to exclusion, was all before the committee, because the House provision and the Senate provision did not in the least agree. The object of the conference was to find some just and equitable rule which would be fair to all alike and produce as little hardship as possible. They decided that between the ages of 16 and 50 it was possible for any man or woman, if he or she really desired to come to the United States, to learn to read and write. Therefore they put that very moderate limit, neither very low in the one case nor very high in the other, within which they assumed that any man or woman who desired to come here would be able to read and write or to learn to do so. Those over 50 and under 16 they treated as physically incapable; that is, they could come in without the illiteracy test.

Senators have pointed to the fact that the clause inserted in the Senate which was not inserted in the House of Representatives, providing that a husband could bring his wife, has gone from the bill, and that therefore great hardship and cruelty have been inflicted. Mr. President, that contention rests on no foundation whatever, if Senators will give this matter their full consideration. The immigrants who come to this country come here voluntarily. There are many men who come here now who leave their wives behind. Is the United States responsible for that separation of a family? We do not ask them to separate; we do not bid them to come here.

The Senator from Maryland attempted to draw a parallel between the immigrant from Europe and the slave of the old times. Mr. President, in those times the slave was taken by force, wrested from his home, dragged here under the protection of our laws, torn from wife and children in Africa, and separated again from them when he made his new ties here. We drag no immigrants from Europe. They come here because they wish to.

This discussion starts, in my mind, on a very false premise. It is not the right of anyone to come to the United States. It is a privilege which we accord. This country in which we live to-day is the country of every American citizen, no matter what his race origin, who is to-day, at this moment, and at this hour a citizen of the United States, helping in its burdens, paying its taxes, ready to fight for its flag. Those men, those American citizens, own this country to-day. It is for them to say who shall come and who shall stay out. The immigrant does not come here by right; he comes here because we allow him to come; and we may make any restrictions on his coming that we please. We have no right to inflict unjust and cruel hardships upon him, but we do not separate a husband from his wife or a wife from her husband by this legislation; we exclude nobody under this law which is so attacked. We simply say to everyone between the ages of 16 and 50, "If you want to come to the United States, you are of an age when you can learn to read and write." We say, "Before you come, you shall learn in some language to read the Constitution of the country where you expect to live, and to sign your own name to the oath of allegiance which you mean to take."

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to finish my argument, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. HILL. I want to thoroughly understand this bill. The general provisions may be all right enough, but under the Senate bill, which was carefully framed, the immigrant could bring his wife with him, could he not?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will only allow me to finish my argument, I will answer any question he chooses to put to me after I get through; but I should like to finish what I desire to say.

Mr. HILL. I only want to understand——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. HILL. I wish to understand this point——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think I have the right to proceed in my own way, and have asked in every possible way to be allowed to do so. I will answer any question if I can only be permitted to make my argument in my own way, and then reply to suggestions subsequently.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. LODGE. We changed the exception, and for this obvious reason, that the exception only made the thing worse. We said in the Senate amendment that the husband who can read and write could bring in his illiterate wife, but there was no provision in case the wife could read and write and the husband was illiterate. If it is cruel to separate the husband from the wife, it is equally cruel to separate the wife from the husband. You must make both exceptions; then you must except the brothers and sisters; then you must except the children over 16; and then you must go on and except all the relations, until there is absolutely nobody excluded who has a family tie of any kind.

As I was saying, this coming is voluntary, entirely voluntary. There is nothing to prevent a man having his wife come with him or come after him because she can not read and write at the time. She can learn to read and write, as he can. Surely it is not a heavy price to pay for citizenship in the United States.

Then, Mr. President, still further as to this matter of the separation of families, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this practical consideration. Last year over 75,000 people who admitted they could not read and write came into the United States. Does anyone suppose for one moment that the steamship companies, charitable organizations as we know they are, are going to bring 75,000 illiterate immigrants to this country for the pleasure of having it discovered at Ellis Island that they are illiterate, and then taking them back again? Anyone who has studied this question of immigration, Mr. President, knows that this law will be enforced on the other side. The steamship companies will not knowingly bring anyone who is obnoxious to the provisions of this bill; there will be none of these heartrending separations which have been so strongly depicted; and if you begin to make exceptions there will be no end. The only way is to make some fair, equitable, general rule as to the age within which people can reasonably be expected to learn to read and write, and then if they do not come to the United States, or if they separate from their husbands or their wives rather than do so, it is because they are not willing to learn to read and write, and we are no more responsible by our legislation for such separations than we are responsible to-day. No man need separate himself from his wife, no wife need separate herself from her husband, so far as the United States laws are concerned. We do not make, cause, or suggest any separation; we only seek a fair law which provides for the illiteracy test as the test for admitting immigrants to this country. This cry about the separation of husbands and wives is a purely sentimental one got up to defeat the bill, and has no foundation in fact.

Mr. President, the immigration that it is proposed to limit last year amounted to 343,000 persons—the population of a large city, and a population equal to that of many of our States. Where did they go? About 80,000 of them went out into the West to go on the land and to become farmers and help build up that new country. The rest, some 260,000, I think, dropped right down here on the Atlantic Coast in our great cities, chiefly in New York, in Massachusetts, and in Pennsylvania. The class of immigrants that our brethren in the West receive on their prairies, on their fertile lands, is the class of immigrants that any people might be glad to receive. They do not see that class that comes and settles down in our great Eastern cities.

I have referred already, Mr. President, to the unemployed in the United States. The other day in New York, when that snowstorm came, they called for additional men to shovel the snow from the streets; they asked for 200 men, and 2,000 human beings fought and struggled in front of the door of the man who gave out these work tickets to get one day's work in shoveling snow. And every immigrant that you bring into this country adds to that struggling mob of men who will fight to get a dollar and a half, earned by the hardest manual labor; and yet we are invited to add to it and to add to it, not even to sift it or restrict it.

Mr. President, where does this opposition that has sprung up with such violence come from? I said, when I spoke here before, that the opposition, so far as it was formidable, emanated from the steamship companies. Here and there, of course, there have been gentlemen in both Houses, like my friend the Senator from Maryland, whose study of the subject and whose knowledge of the statistics has led him to different conclusions on this subject from myself, and he has argued the question of principle which appeals so strongly to him in opposition to this measure with his accustomed acuteness and abilty. I do not, in what I am about to say, make the slightest reference to any Senator. What I refer to is the outside opposition which has sprung up lately. It came, as I said it would come, from the steamship companies. Perhaps I ought to say it comes from one steamship company. I do not suppose that any of the steamship or the railroad companies are particularly favorable to this legislation. They look more at passenger receipts, I am afraid, than at the effect on the quality of American citizenship or American boats or American labor of an unrestricted immigration; but the company that we have heard from is the North German Lloyd.

The immigration that is affected by this illiteracy test comes from Bohemia, from Poland, from Hungary, from Russia, from Italy. Its great ports of exit are Bremen and Hamburg and Genoa and Naples. To all those points go the steamers of the North German Lloyd or of the Hamburg Line, which is practically the same thing. I understand they have a pooling agreement. Those lines are the two affected. We have heard no cry from the Thingvalla Line, which brings the Scandinavians to this country, because this bill will not exclude a single Scandinavian. We have heard of but little opposition from the great lines running to England, because the mass of their passengers are not affected by the illiteracy test. Half of 1 per cent from Scandinavia, less than 2 per cent from Germany, less than 5 per cent from the United Kingdom, less than 9 per cent from Ireland are unable to read and write. Where the immigration comes from that is affected by the illiteracy test, there we find the steamship company in active and violent opposition.

I printed a short time ago a telegram which had been sent me from Milbank, in South Dakota, by a gentleman known to the Senator from that State, and favorably known in South Dakota. That telegram was as follows:

To F. W. A. POPPIE, Milbank, S. Da'k.:

Immigration bill comes up in House Wednesday. Wire your Congressman, our expense, protesting against proposed exclusion, and requesting bill be defeated, informing him that vote in favor means defeat next election.

(Signed) CLAUSSENIUS & CO.,
North German Lloyd Agents in Chicago.

Then they came out with the statement in reply to my publication of that telegram, saying that they were acting as individuals and not as the agents of the steamship company. Last Saturday I received in my mail a printed circular, which these individuals have been sending out. It is addressed "to agents," to other individuals with no interest in the company.

CHICAGO, January 25, 1897.

To Agents:

The immigration bill, which is intended to materially restrict immigration, comes up for final disposition in the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., on Wednesday, 27th instant.

It is quite clear that immigration will really be restricted almost to the extent of total exclusion of immigrants should the bill become a law, and every effort should therefore be made to insure the defeat of the bill.

You are indirectly interested in the defeat of the bill as much as we are, and we would respectfully ask you to wire your Representative in Congress immediately upon receipt of this to vote against the bill, informing him that the measure virtually means exclusion, and that his vote in favor of same will mean repudiation by his constituents and his defeat at the next election.

Trusting that you will not fail to give this matter your prompt attention,

We are, yours, respectfully,

H. CLAUSSENIUS & CO.

And with it went this little slip:

Wire your Representative fully and let us know cost of telegram, and we will promptly refund amount to you.

Mr. President, here is a great company, a foreign corporation, subsidized by a foreign government, not only with its agents in this Capitol, as they were the other day when the bill was up in the House, but telegraphing far and wide throughout the United States to all their agents to send in threatening dispatches to members of Congress called upon to vote upon that bill. To every newspaper in which they have an advertisement they sent another telegram, and the hand of that company has been felt in this business ever since it looked as if the bill would get upon the statute book. You can see it to-day in the newspapers. Here is the report that the President has given it out that he means to veto the bill. Mr. President, no President of the United States would think of giving authority to anybody to say or of saying himself that he intended either to veto or to sign a bill before he had considered it and before it had been sent to him in a perfected state for his consideration. That paragraph comes from the same source as those telegrams. It does not predict the action of the President, for we know that the President will give this measure careful judicial consideration when it comes before him. It means that this same company will carry the raid which they began on Congress from the Capitol even to the White House.

I am not one of those who has ever indulged in the somewhat fashionable exercise of denouncing trusts, monopolies, syndicates, and corporations. I am not so dull that I can not see in those questions grave dangers, but I do not believe they can be met by loose denunciation or vague invective. I think, sir, they require the calmest consideration, the greatest wisdom, and the most intelligent action of which the Congress of the United States and the President acting with them are capable. But when I see a great corporation like this, a foreign corporation, subsidized by a foreign government, coming into the Capitol with threats to members of Congress, using all the great enginery of its agents and all the great enginery of its advertising and everything that a great corporation has, coming here, I say, to take Representatives or Senators by the throat and say to them: "We will beat you," then I say that here is a case where your corporate influence is bad, and where you can meet it practically and efficiently. Strike it down.

We have heard about trusts, syndicates, monopolies, and corporations on the stump, in resolutions, and in all kinds of bills which have been offered here. Yes; we have heard them denounced in Presidential messages within two months, and yet here is one of them now right in the Capitol to-day—its agents, I have no doubt, within sound of my voice—trying to choke off legislation of the United States which, whatever its merits or its defects, should be dealt with only on public grounds, only with a view to the quality of American citizenship and the rights and opportunities of American labor. The question how many passengers an ocean steamship line shall carry or what dividends it shall declare are of no importance in comparison with such a question as this.

Such, Mr. President, has been the nature of the opposition. I have alluded to it because it has been flagrant, objectionable in the highest degree, and when I see this company coming forward prating about the misery of separating families, and reflect on the humanity shown by some of its officers and men on the occasion of a great disaster, it seems to me that the less they say about humanity to others the better.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I have not quite finished. I desire to say a few more words.

Mr. HILL. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he closes, and I will avail myself of his kindness to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be very glad to yield.

It is represented that our citizens of German extraction are hostile to the bill. A German steamship company is hostile. I think our fellow-citizens of German extraction who are not in the least affected by the bill as immigrants have yet to show their hostility. I have the petitions of a half dozen labor organizations of New York, every member of which is of German birth or nationality, and they have unanimously asked for the passage of the bill and sometimes for much severer measures.

Mr. President, those of us who have been studying this question, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] and I at least have done for the last eight or ten years, have tried to bring forward a measure which would commend itself to the good sense and to the humanity of the people of the United States in mitigating a great and pressing evil. We have been urged to put on a heavy capitation tax—a rough, indiscriminate method of restriction which we have put aside. Demands with which many of us have sympathized have been pressed upon us with a view to get us absolutely to limit immigration to 50,000 or 100,000. Those petitions are on your table to-day. Some ask for absolute prohibition. Some ask for a limitation to 100,000 or 50,000. They come from organized labor, but unorganized labor feels the same way. Workingmen have awakened to the plain fact that every additional immigrant is another competitor in the terribly overcrowded ranks of the unemployed.

We have sought to get a test which should be fair and which should not only restrict but should also sift and discriminate. It was one of the early settlers of this country, from which this great nation of States has grown, who said, "God sifted a whole nation to plant these colonies in the wilderness." Surely it is not too much to sift now the hordes that pour out of every European steamship unsifted, uncounted, unchecked, into the great port of New York. That is all we ask, and the test we offer to apply is the test of reading and writing. Is that an un-American test? Mr. President, this is the country of the public school. We look upon education as the foundation stone of the Republic, and all we ask in this test is that the people shall read and write in some living language. It is an American test. It is a fair test. Surely there is nothing in it tyrannical, un-American, or wrong. It was the greatest genius among men who said, three hundred years ago, "Ignorance is the curse of God; knowledge the wing with which we fly to heaven." That is all we propose in this bill. We have brought it here after long and careful consideration. We have sought to make it just to all, to immigrants and to citizens alike. But we have felt it to be our duty to regard, first and before all, the welfare of the United States and the interest of American citizens who live at this day and at this moment within her borders.

Mr. President, this, in my judgment, is a great and useful measure. It is a part of a policy more important, I venture to say, than what we can hope for from tariff or currency or bankruptcy bills. I think it involves matters that lie at the very root of American civilization. It has grown out of a change in the character of our immigration within the last ten or fifteen years. The races that built up this country come in diminishing numbers. New races, utterly alien, come in ever-increasing numbers. What we now seek to accomplish by the pending bill is to sift this immigration and restrict it, to choose among those immigrants. I believe it to be, as I have said, a great and useful measure. I ask only that we shall have a vote upon it in the Senate. It has been discussed in every stage, both in the House and in the Senate, on conference report, and in every other way. I want a vote upon it. I do not want to see it smothered in the midst of parliamentary delays and obstructions. If the bill passes, as I believe it will pass, the Senate at least will have done its duty in dealing with this great question, as the House has already done. If it fails, so be it. I shall bow in good part to the will of the majority. But it will come and come again, be well assured. I know how the feeling of labor is growing in this country. I know they see the competition increasing with them every day, for every immigrant is another of the unemployed. They will ask stronger measures than this, and then, like many postponed reforms, it will come, when it does come, with a thoroughness which perhaps will make many persons regret their opposition to this bill.

If the Senate votes it down, so be it; but if the bill fails at any point or in any stage, no matter who opposes it here or who has opposed it elsewhere—I make no reflections, of course, on any of those gentlemen; I appreciate the sincerity of their motives and the depth of their principle—but I repeat, wherever the bill meets defeat, if it should meet defeat, it will be taken throughout this country after what has happened as the victory of a corporation upon a great question of public policy. It can be taken as nothing else. That is the mischief of this corporate interference here. That is why I have dwelt upon it, not as an argument for the bill, but because I wish to denounce it from my place in the Senate as improper, unbecoming, and dangerous. It leads to that conclusion in the popular mind. If the bill fails, it will make people believe once again that corporate influences are all powerful in Washington. It will add another item to the long account that is being summed up against corporate influences. It will add another charge in the reckoning which may come upon us if greater wisdom is not shown, a reckoning to which I for one look forward with the deepest dread. I want to see such a reckoning avoided and escaped. I want these evils met as they can be met by the Congress of the United States, and I want to see this open, flagrant, corporate influence in this case rebuked now, as it deserves, when it enters the Capitol of the United States.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business may be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York desires to ask me a question. I will very gladly answer it if I can.

Mr. MORGAN. If it leads to debate, I think it will be a violation of the courtesies of the Senate. I do not want to cut off the Senator from New York from asking a question or saying a word or two, but I hope debate will not be indulged in.

Mr. HILL. I wish to take only a few moments.

Mr. MORGAN. Senators have said, although I think perhaps the point is not well taken, that I had a right to object at 2 o'clock to the discussion going on. I did not object, because the report has not been received by the Senate. It was a question of order, which was elaborately argued by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], and I thought it was but due, inasmuch as the President of the Senate was called upon to decide the question of order, that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] should have an opportunity to reply upon that question. Instead of that we have had a speech, an argument, an oration, and I must say an able one, too. But it is a wrongful abuse of the courtesy of the Senate, and I will not consent that it shall go on further. I should like very much indeed to indulge the Senator from New York in discussing further this matter, but he will recognize my duty in the premises.

Mr. HILL. I am very grateful to the Senator from Alabama, who undoubtedly desires to accommodate me. I simply wish to say that I trust the great corporate influences about which we have heard so much will not interfere, but that the whole matter may go over until to-morrow, when I shall take occasion to make a few remarks, not in regard to the immigration question generally, but with respect to the particular point wherein it is claimed that the conference committee have virtually reported several entirely new and distinct features which have not heretofore been discussed.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is already before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. The unfinished business has been laid before the Senate. I do not desire to have any precedent raised about the question as to what has been before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was simply reminding the Senate that that is the business before the body. At the hour of 2 o'clock the unfinished business was laid before the Senate, and was laid aside temporarily at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3328) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes;" which were, on page 2, line 19, after the word "apply," to insert "only;" on page 2, line 21, after the word "in," to insert "North Dakota;" and on page 2, line 21, after the words "South Dakota," to insert "and Nebraska."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I desire, before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds, to ask him if he thinks, as representing the opposition to this bill, that there will ever be a time when its opponents will consent to a vote in season to allow any other business, except appropriation bills, to be done at the present session?

Mr. VILAS. I hardly think I can be called upon to speculate in respect to the opinions of other gentlemen. When the debate which the opponents of the bill intend to offer shall have been concluded, I have no idea they will offer any other opposition to it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. With entire deference, I do not gather a great deal of meaning from his answer. Of course it is within the power of any five or ten gentlemen in this body to say in regard to any measure, "It shall be debated so that a vote never can be taken upon it." Of course if they were asked the question, they would not answer in that way, but they would say, "When the debate is concluded there is no doubt there will be a vote."

But I ask the Senator, as knowing the purposes of the gentlemen who agree with him, and of whom he is in some sense if not the leader one of the leaders. I am very much interested in other legislation. I desire, in reference to that other legislation, to know whether he believes (I do not ask him to speculate, but he must know from intercourse with his associates) it is their intention to get through debating the pending bill in time so that any other legislation can be taken up at the present session of Congress?

Mr. VILAS. I have no doubt that it depends simply upon the time when we shall get through with our discussion. There are a number of gentlemen to speak upon the bill yet in opposition to it, as I am told. How much time they will consume I can not undertake to say. For myself, I can say that when I shall have addressed to the Senate the fair and proper arguments which I think this very important measure demands I shall have no desire to occupy any more time, and I will in no way put an obstruction to a vote.

Mr. HOAR. Then I understand the Senator to say, in answer to my inquiry, that he is not willing to say from any knowledge he has that he believes debate in opposition to the measure will be ended in time for any other legislation?

Mr. VILAS. I do not know how the Senator may understand what I have said. As to my belief on the subject, I am unable to declare a belief until I have heard something further as to what the debate will be in opposition. I know there are several gentlemen to speak, and I do not propose to abridge them by an expression of belief or in any wise to interfere with their proper discussion.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment? I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as additional sections:

SEC. —. The bonds hereinbefore mentioned shall not be guaranteed and no money shall be expended in the construction of the canal until a survey has been made by a competent board of engineers, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and a complete plan prepared for the entire work, and such plan shall be approved by the President of the United States.

SEC. —. Should it appear from the report of said board of engineers that the cost of said canal will be more than $150,000,000, the President shall reject the plan, and the bonds herein provided for shall not be guaranteed, and the Government of the United States shall not assume any liability in the construction of said canal.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment further?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say, after the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that I intend to avail myself of the Senatorial privilege which I have to discuss this question, and I am not to be disturbed by anything the Senator may suggest which indicates that he thinks there is unnecessary delay in the matter. This is a question which has been before the Senate for a number of years. It is a very important question, whether we shall build the canal; and if so, how we shall build. It is a question which has attracted the attention of the engineers of the world. It is a question to which I myself for many years have given a good deal of attention. I insisted upon this floor years ago that there were no data which would justify either the Government of the United States or any body of capitalists in taking up and building the canal; that there are not sufficient data to know what it will cost. In fact, there are not sufficient data before the Senate and the country to-day to know whether it is a feasible project at all from an engineering standpoint.

We have the report of the Board of Government Engineers, which I intend to take up, and I think if I can get the attention of the Senate I will establish the fact that the Board of Engineers have declared and pointed out specifically the lack of knowledge on our part that renders it criminal, absolutely criminal, for the Senate to vote to put a dollar into it until it shall be known, first, if it is feasible, and second, what it is going to cost. There is not a man in the Senate who, after he has read that report, can say within $100,000,000 what the canal is going to cost. The difference between the company which has exploited the project so far and the Government engineers as to the expense is, roughly stated, something like $70,000,000, if I recollect aright; or more than that, in fact. The engineers tell us that there are not sufficient data for them to make their calculations; that they made them upon such data as they could get. Here and there they tell you is another obstacle, in reference to which they have been unable to make any calculation as to how much it will cost. When that calculation is made it must be added to the cost they have already estimated. I do not believe the Senate, when the case is presented—as it will be presented—will be willing to enter upon this crusade of expenditure without sufficient data. I propose myself to present this matter to the Senate if it takes all day, or two days. I shall not be deterred from doing it.

If the canal is ever to be built, it ought to be built by the Government of the United States, and it ought to be built in such a way and in such a manner as to be of value to us and to the world. No man living can say upon what plan this company, if authorized to make the expenditure under the pending bill, propose to build it. Nobody can tell even how big the locks are to be, whether they are to be big enough to take in the ships of the present day, or the ships that are to be built much larger in the future.

Mr. President, the opposition to the pending bill is not simply a trifling one. It is founded upon good ground, and if the Senator from Massachusetts is in favor of the measure he will do well to address himself to the defense of the bill, and not to a criticism of those who may not agree with him.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado will do well to understand what I say before he criticises it. I have made no criticism of anyone. I have not said anything about anyone, except that in the interest of other legislation I asked the Senator from Wisconsin if he was able to say now if we have got far enough for him to believe that this debate would be ended in time for other legislation. I made no comment on anyone, no criticism on anyone, no attack on anyone.

The trouble with my honorable friend from Colorado is that when he gets excited, as he does very often indeed (and he is the most excitable of human creatures, perhaps, with the possible exception of myself), he thinks that other people are saying something in opposition to him, and goes off at half-cock without knowing what they say.

Mr. TELLER. I expressed my opinion about the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody is objecting to that; it is a very sensible and excellent opinion in many respects; but I shall look with some curiosity for the answer to it. I have not criticised the Senator, or the opponents of the bill, or anyone. I have asked when they thought the debate would get through. I think the Senator from Colorado, in the midst of his great public avocations, may possibly find himself inclined to resign some time the position of guardian over me. He never was selected by me for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have no desire to be the guardian of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I could not be if I did desire it.

Now, I did not mean to be offensive to the Senator from Massachusetts. I thought the Senator did what, in my experience in the Senate (which is not quite as long as his, although I came here before he did), I never heard before. I never heard that kind of a question addressed to any Senator here. If it had been addressed to me, I know, quick as I am to resent things, as he said, I should have felt that it was not exactly the thing to do. I felt then, and I think the Senate will bear me out in the impression, that in that particular there was at least an intimation on the part of the Senator that this debate was intended purposely for delay. If the Senator from Wisconsin did not so understand it, he at least acted so in his reply. If the Senator did not mean that, I shall recall everything that I have said, which I am sure could not have been very offensive, except that I thought if the Senator was in favor of the bill he should address himself to the defense of the bill. That I still insist he should do. I should like to hear the Senator. It would delight me to have the Senator take up that report and stand before the American people and tell the American people whether, with the lack of knowledge the commission say this company have, he thinks we ought to go into an expenditure of $150,000,000 or $200,000,000. It would delight me if the Senator would do that.

If the Senator thinks my remarks were discourteous, I shall certainly withdraw them. He can have them even stricken out of the RECORD if it is desirable that he should do so. I did not intend to be discourteous, and usually I am not discourteous, although, of course, I confess I am somewhat sensitive about attacks, especially when it comes to a discussion in the Senate on a question involving a couple of hundred million dollars. It seems to me that we ought to have plenty of time, and that there ought to be no criticism, either open or covert, as to the delay until at least there is an apparent purpose in the delay.

Here is a bill which has been before the Senate only a few days, and there are at least, I think, a dozen Senators who are opposed to it who propose to be heard against it. I do not think that we can be charged with any unnecessary delay. The Senator says to me he does not charge it, but I certainly thought the intimation was——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator from Wisconsin perfectly understands what I desire. He certainly manifested no feeling of sensitiveness about it. I am in favor of the bill, but I am in favor of it because I am in favor of the general principle of the bill and because it has been very carefully considered by the gentlemen to whom it was committed. I am not familiar with its details, and never should think of addressing the Senate in regard to the matter of the details.

I have very unfortunately the charge of another important measure which is on the docket coming after the pending bill, and I am interested in several other measures. I wanted to know with reference to that important measure what in the judgment of the Senator from Wisconsin would be likely to be the time taken by the pending bill, whether there was any chance of getting that up, looking at it with a view of preparing myself as well as I can to be ready to deal with it when it comes up. I had no thought of anything except to look out for the interest of that other bill; for if this debate is to go on for some time, there will have to be a test question between continuing the present debate and taking up that bill which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has so earnestly urged. I do not want to make a motion to lay aside the Nicaragua Canal bill, which I favor, and unnecessarily to be put in apparent antagonism with my views and all the friends or the leading friends of this measure; but the time will have to come at some period, unless we can agree on a time to take a vote on the pending bill, and that is what I had in mind.

Mr. TELLER. Very good.

Mr. HOAR. I confined my question mainly to the Senator from Wisconsin, who, I think, understood what I was after when I put the question.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think I need make any further apology to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have accepted his statement. If there is any blame it can rest upon me. The Senator says he is not acquainted with this subject. I do not think he is if he is in favor of the bill. Mr. President, I am, and I have been for a number of years. I am competent to pass upon these questions by my education and by my tastes. I have given to this question a good deal of attention, and I have said again and again here that from an engineering standpoint there was no evidence before the Senate that would justify us in attempting to build that canal.

I desire to address myself to that question, and that question only, and if takes some little time to do it I propose to do it. We are not pressing the bill. We are not the people who are obstructing legislation by presenting the bill to the Senate. It is the friends of the bill who are obstructing it. I have no particular feeling against the people who want the bill passed. If the company have got into trouble, I have no objection to the Government of the United States taking the canal off of their hands, whenever it shall be determined that we want to construct the canal ourselves. If it shall be thought best and that we ought to pay the company for what they have expended and to take this work upon ourselves I do not know that I should object very much, but I do not want, then, that the canal shall be commenced without sufficient data. In my judgment upon the plan of the company it would be an absolute failure, and could never be completed with satisfaction; and that is the opinion of men who have given the subject close attention as engineers, and on whose judgment I rely.

So believing, I should think that I did not do my duty to the American people if I should sit still and see the bill become a law. I am acting upon my judgment as a Senator, as the Senator is acting upon his, with the difference that he says he follows the committee. I do not choose to follow the committee, because I do not believe that the reports before the Senate show that the committee have such data. They could not have any greater data than the company have. Unless this board falsifies the facts, it is established that the company had not the very essential knowledge of conditions there to justify the commencement of the dams and embankments, to determine their size, or anything else connected with them.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, with his great courtesy, to allow me to put a question to the Senator from Alabama. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama if he would be willing at some day in the future, say to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, or even as late as next Monday, to lay the bill aside informally, if a final vote is not reached, with a view of taking up the bankruptcy bill for a day or two?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the pending bill was brought forward at the request of some of the ablest and most prominent Senators of this body by me at a time when I did not desire to bring it forward. Those gentlemen who favor the canal have been for a long number of years engaged in its consideration, and both of the great political parties of this country have avowed their friendship for it and their desire to have it built. There is no doubt about the sentiment of the American people. The working people and all other classes, but more particularly the industrial classes, desire to have the canal built. The American mind is not made up, can not be made up, to the conclusion that we are to abandon this plan. There are very few Americans who desire to see the plan abandoned. I do not mean the precise plan of construction, but I mean the cutting of the canal through Nicaragua. There are some railroad men who, inconsiderately and foolishly, object to it, work against it, conspire in every way how to break it down, thinking that thereby they are going to increase their own income. They seem to be given to feathering their own nests with downy linings, regardless of the plumage of the great eagle that soars over them. They seem to have no respect for that bird at all when they get a downy place and sit upon a nest to hatch their young in and raise their progeny. They are the men, and the only men in the United States, who have combined in opposition to the bill.

The bill has been under the consideration of at least 150 of the best lawyers of the United States, members of Congress. If you will count the committees of the Senate that have passed upon the bill, and consider their composition; if you will count the committees of the House, and if you will observe the remarkable care that they have taken of every detail of the bill, it will surprise anybody that a man should venture to get up on this floor and state that any part of the bill had never received faithful and able consideration.

As to the engineering projects that are contained in the bill, they commenced with Mr. Childs's survey under Vanderbilt forty-five or fifty years ago, and they have come down regularly. Three surveys have been made, paid for by the Government of the United States, and they have been laid before the various committees. Another survey has been made at very great expense and with great care by the Maritime Canal Company, in which they have paid out their money; and they received a statement, not from one engineer, but from the board of five additional engineers, the best that the country affords, to show the entire practicability of it, and that it would not cost more than $83,000,000.

Then we sent a board of commissioners out there, who went at a hop, skip, and a jump over it, who did not have time to investigate it at all, who did not have the money with which to investigate it. We only put up here on the part of Congress $20,000, and the Maritime Company supplemented it with another $20,000 to clear the way, that they might have a full opportunity to investigate it. They laid all their engineering plans and data of every kind before them. They spent three months in the investigation of that data, and then they came in with a proposition that $135,000,000 would certainly build the canal, after putting on the most extravagant allowances that they could conceive of, and that the scheme was thoroughly practicable. They stated it a dozen times before the committee of the House. The House investigated the subject and sent its investigation here. The House bill was reported here to the Senate without the change of a word in it, so that the two Houses are perfectly in harmony through their committees in the presentation of the bill.

I thought while the Senator from Colorado was reading his amendment that if that honorable, sagacious, wise, and learned Senator had only taken the pains to compare his amendment with the bill he would have found that the whole of it was covered in the bill. The construction of the canal can not proceed until the President of the United States has appointed three engineers of the Army, who have examined it and have reported to him upon its feasibility. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars, I think, is the sum for a preliminary survey. I am willing to make it $300,000, if that is what the engineers want to spend, for it seems to be the big thing now to get an engineering grab out of it. That is the milk in the cocoanut about that report. I am willing to spend, if the Senator from Colorado is willing, $300,000 in making a preliminary survey. The President of the United States is to be thoroughly informed about the plan, the location, the feasibility, the practicability, and all that, before he can put the canal under construction.

Then what? Then we must appoint a board of engineers to supervise, to control the working of the plan after it has been adopted, without any sort of disturbance from the company. They have no right to interfere with him.

Who is the company they are talking about? The men who have spent their money there, under the arrangement proposed, if we choose to accept it, will have 7 per cent of voting power in that company. The United States will have 70 per cent—just ten times more power. Nicaragua will have 1½ per cent, and Costa Rica has 1 per cent of voting power in the company after it has been reorganized under the provisions of the act, if they accept it. If they do not accept it, it amounts to nothing.

I am perfectly willing to put into the law a provision that if the cost of it exceeds $150,000,000, or the estimates made by the Army engineers, the President shall suspend all operations until Congress shall further direct. The committee made all the calculation, on which this report is based, upon $150,000,000, although I feel as conscious as I could be of any fact, and as a nonprofessional man could feel about a matter of the kind, that it will never cost $80,000,000 to build it. It can not cost it unless it is one of the Government extravagances in which money is thrown to the winds whenever they get a chance at a job. If we can get any control of the engineers and hold them down so that they will not enrich themselves and all their posterity by the loot that they will get out of this work, we can build it for $83,000,000 beyond a question.

Now, sir, if I were to do what the Senator from Massachusetts asks me to do—withdraw the bill—what would be left here in front of us? I call your attention to it. What would be left in front of us? A vortex, in which there would be involved more trouble and danger to the people of the United States than any question that has come up since the civil war. What is that? The Senator from Wisconsin the other evening let drop the remark, I think, that this concession expires in April next. That is not the fact. That is the Nicaraguan view of the question recently put up, but Nicaragua herself has never contended for it.

Mr. VILAS. This was explicitly declared, I will say to the Senator, in the eighth article.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin takes that side of the question every time. He takes the Nicaraguan side against our people. Let him do it if he wants to. But that question has been settled by agreement not merely between Nicaragua and the company, but between the Government of Nicaragua and the Government of the United States, and so Mr. Blaine and so Mr. Gresham have declared. It was settled under the supervision of a minister of the Government of the United States, who went there and looked at it and witnessed the settlement. Now the Senator gets up and takes the Nicaraguan side of it, and says the concession will be forfeited next April.

Mr. VILAS. I will thank the Senator from Alabama if he will kindly refer me to the evidence of that statement.

Mr. MORGAN. The last report I made here last Friday shows it beyond question. There it is in print and in the Senator's hands.

Mr. VILAS. Last Friday?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir, last Friday; and the Senator is astonished. It seems he has not read it. He is willing to get up here and take the Nicaraguan side of the question and make observations about the rights of our people that destroy them absolutely——

Mr. VILAS. I wish to say that I have read that report, but I saw in it nothing of that kind.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will read it again, he will see it.

Now, Mr. President, I said if I were to withdraw the bill a vortex is opened here, and that honorable and grave Senator who sits in front of me, whose ability we all acknowledge and whose patriotism no man doubts, would have more on his hands than if he were a Talleyrand and a Metternich combined to get along with after I withdraw the bill. What is it? It is that the American Congress have abandoned the rights that our people have got under their own legislation. Read Mr. Blaine's dispatch in the report that I presented on last Friday, and you will see what view an American statesman took of this matter. You will see how an American Secretary of State who felt like he was an American handled this question in favor of our own people. They came here and asked us for a charter. On what authority did they ask it? The express language of the concession. The concessions required them to go to some other country and form a company of construction. They named New York City as the home of the corporation of construction. They came and asked us and we chartered them, and in chartering them we put restrictions upon Nicaragua and Costa Rica and everybody else concerned in it of the most rigid character.

After we had done that, the company organized, Nicaragua, being present in that company by her minister in the organization, accepting it through and through. That company has gone on, and its president, under the law, has been required to make, and has made annually, a report under oath of the whole situation. Diplomatic correspondence, interchange of notes of various kinds have taken place here until it would shame an American statesman to deny that we had acquired rights in this way as to the Government of Nicaragua that she must enforce. She can not be permitted, with honor to this country and with justice to our own people, to change her attitude; and the very moment that I should withdraw this bill, with the consent of the Senate, we should have abandoned the whole of that ground, and the Senator from Ohio who is to be the Secretary of State of the incoming Administration would find himself in what has been described by Mr. Blaine as a controversy with a half dozen little republics in Central America. Suppose I should add my humble opinion that in that controversy the same thing would occur time and again which occurred heretofore—that is to say, that they would demand money from any government that they undertook to treat with for the purpose of fixing the contract. How many times have they made concessions and forfeited them just as often as they could do it? Every time they got something in advance for a concession they forfeited the concession, got the money into their treasury, and never paid it back. Now, to say the least of it, they have got $150,000 in gold from this company; they have got a large number of improvements of a very valuable kind there; they have got surveys that they want. Whether the Senator from Colorado thinks they are of any account or not, they have cost an enormous amount of money, and Nicaragua wants them. She will get all of those. She will snap her fingers in your face and say she will not treat with you. Then what are you going to do? Send your guns down there and capture her? Are you going to have a war?

Mr. TELLER. She will treat with us.

Mr. MORGAN. No; she will not treat with us. She can not treat with us upon the proposition she has made, because President Cleveland, when he first came into office—the honorable Senator from Wisconsin being one of his advisers at the time, one of his Cabinet—choked to death this very treaty.

Mr. TELLER. They will make another treaty.

Mr. VILAS. They have proffered another.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; $4,000,000 more. Then what will the Senator do? He has changed his mind so that he will now vote for such a treaty, when he and the President he was with at that time snatched it out of the hands of the Senate and refused to allow us to vote on it.

Mr. President, there are things here in regard to which the lapse of time has sometimes brought gentlemen in utter conflict with themselves. There can be no harm in our passing this bill even if the House of Representatives does not pass it, or if it should never go into execution; but, on the contrary, there is a demand for the passage of it that is absolutely insuperable, unless we intend to yield the whole question of the canal. Pass this bill through the Senate, and what will come then? The same congratulations which came from Nicaragua two years ago, when we passed a similar bill through the Senate, only a bill less favorable to Nicaragua than this. There came a flame of electric telegrams congratulating the country—both countries—upon the passage of that very bill two years ago. They are set forth in the report.

I have had occasion here to do a thing that I dislike very much to do, and that is to make statements before this body upon testimony that I know of, but that I am under constraint about saying anything about. All of us often get into that condition. I have asserted here that British emissaries have been at work from the time this was started down to this very date trying to interrupt and prevent this canal from being built. They think that if they can drive the Senate of the United States away from its duty in passing a bill affirming the right of this company, whether that bill becomes a law or not, then they have got us in a condition where they can handle us very easily through their refusal to negotiate treaties with us of a fair description, and through that minority vote of a third of the Senate which they think they can always rely upon to defeat any measure of this kind.

We have now got this matter before the legislative tribunal of the country in a form that the Senate of the United States can express its convictions, if it can not do any more, and I should as soon have those convictions expressed in a resolution as in a bill for the purposes of the diplomatic situation. But, sir, I am not going to yield upon that proposition until some man shows me the way out. We have not got any advantages at the present time, but we have certain very important rights included in this programme, and I am for insisting upon those rights and for strengthening the hands of the next Secretary of State, so that he can go to Nicaragua and say: "Do you expect that we are going to yield the rights of those American citizens at your will and at your behest when the Senate of the United States has twice passed upon this question and affirmed those rights?" The way, Mr. President, to get into trouble is to simply invite it, particularly when you are dealing with a number of very small nations, who notoriously are engaged continually in raids upon each other.

Now, we are paying great attention to what Nicaragua has said. What has Costa Rica said about it? Costa Rica is just as important a factor in this canal as Nicaragua; her rights are identical with those of Nicaragua. It is very true that after Nicaragua had remedied the infirmity in her title and we negotiated with her and paid her the money, it then became evident, on a decision as to the boundary line made by our own President, that we were bound to get a concession from Costa Rica, or else the whole scheme would fail. We went to Costa Rica and put the concession in the very words of the concession granted by Nicaragua; and when Costa Rica came in—Nicaragua knowing it and consenting to it—with her minister to take a seat on the board of directors, Nicaragua objected. That raised another row, and she declared that the concession had been forfeited because Costa Rica had come into it and had done that which Nicaragua was bound in honor to do herself—secure the rights and privileges of the San Juan River where Nicaragua and Costa Rica had a joint right of navigation.

They refused to take their seat in the board at first. The company's president and both the minister from Costa Rica and the minister from Nicaragua came finally and took their seats in the board, and as an oath of office was required, both those ministers took the oath of office in behalf of their Governments. Then there came more telegrams, more congratulations exchanged between these two Governments. "Everything is now serene"—that is the language of one of them. All difficulties were removed. So they have gone on from time to time, until finally there springs up a new sort of mushroom republic called a diet. Three States get together and form a diet, each of them insisting and contending, and representing to our Government also, that they are perfectly independent of each other, but they have submitted their diplomatic affairs into the hands of a common minister. I should like to know what that minister of these three Republics—Honduras and Salvador being two of them—has got to do with our contracts with Nicaragua? Are our contracts with Nicaragua to be vacated, avoided, and annulled at the demand and behest of these other two Republics who have nothing to do with them? But that is the effort. Not only is that the effort, but it does not stop there. Their point is to take Costa Rica and rub her out—one of those little tempestuous arrangements that arise in that little teapot down there, and the storm seems to be big enough just to disconcert the Senate of the United States—that is all; and it comes in here when a bill is about to get on its passage.

I have not any idea that the Government at Nicaragua has ever intrusted to any minister the right to disengage her from a contract which she has made with American citizens; but if she has, she can not do it, and has no right to do it. We are not here for the purpose of seeing our citizens robbed at pleasure by any government, great or small; it is not what we are trying to do here, and if the Senate of the United States will take a vote on this bill, if they will adopt this bill even with the amendments which the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] wants to put into it, they will save this question and save this canal from ruin.

If I should, upon the request of some of the ablest and oldest members of this body, yield this measure, with all of its vast public significance, then, Mr. President, I should have the odium of cowardice and treachery both upon my soul. You do not expect me to do it; surely, I will not do it. I do not care what it is that stands in the way of it; I did not bring it into contact with anybody's bill or anybody's measure. I offered it because the time was lapsing and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] said it was only until April within which we have got to act, and, having stated that, I am compelled to believe that the Senator from Wisconsin would be very glad to see that day in April arrive before this bill passes.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a remark before he proceeds?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to something he can do which will facilitate the passage of the bankrupt bill, which would probably avoid the necessity of any test vote.

I believe that every Senator present is in favor of a voluntary bankruptcy bill. The necessity for it is obvious; nobody doubts that at all; but there are many Senators and many judicious people in the country who are opposed to an involuntary bankruptcy law at this time. In the present depression in the country it is impossible for business men and others to meet their obligations promptly on account of the difficulty of converting their assets into money. An involuntary bankruptcy law will open a field for putting people into bankruptcy at a time when it would destroy many men who would otherwise pull through when times get better, if they ever do.

I know it is said that you can have provision to prevent fraud, and all that, but the fact of putting a man into bankruptcy destroys his property, and the desire of those who have a little money to buy property cheaply may be a motive to proceed, whether they ought properly to do so or not. At all events, you place thousands and hundreds of thousands of good men at the mercy of those who might and probably would take advantage of them. All creditors are not bad men, but there are business men who can not meet their obligations on account of the scarcity of money, who can not convert their property into money, go into bankruptcy, and gratify the greed of those who want to buy their property and have it sold for a small price. If this thing commences, there will be a vast amount of property sold under the hammer, with nobody to buy it, and there will be more harm done, I believe, by an involuntary bankruptcy law at this time than there would be if we should do nothing.

If it becomes important at the next session, if times change, and an involuntary bankruptcy law is desired, such a law as we may now pass can be amended, and we can promptly pass a law which will give relief to those who are bankrupts; but let the matter stand until times change and do not pass such a provision at a time when it would amount to universal confiscation, as it seems to me it would under existing circumstances.

I have observed the operation of bankruptcy laws for many years and labored very hard to get the last bankruptcy act passed; but it had not been in operation six months before petitions came in for its repeal. Congress modified the law and continued to make modifications, but still the petitions came for its repeal, and it was finally removed from the statute book. The same was true of the bankruptcy law of 1842, and the same has been true of all bankruptcy laws, that when they go into operation much scandal grows out of the business and many unworthy men collect around it and form cliques to secure and divide among themselves other men's property.

I suggest that we should not go any further at this time than to do what is absolutely necessary for present relief, because if we do every provision of the bill must be discussed and it will occupy more time than can be given it owing to the consideration of the appropriation and other necessary bills, even if the Nicaraguan Canal bill were out of the way. I hope the Senator will devote his time to eliminating the repulsive features of the present bankruptcy law.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question, and it is this: Whether the Senator sees any connection between the parties behind this involuntary bankruptcy bill and those behind the present financial policy?

Mr. STEWART. Well, those behind the present financial policy in this country, it is true, have all the money, and if the property of the country were put up for sale they are the only persons who would be able to purchase. Whether they will be influenced by such considerations or not, others, who are as good judges of human nature as I am, must draw their own conclusions.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to say that the amendment I offered was included in the bill? I suppose this is the language to which the Senator refers:

That the President of the United States may, and is hereby authorized, in his discretion, at any time after the passage of this act, to appoint a board of three civil engineers.

Is that the provision?

Mr. MORGAN. That is not all of it.

Mr. TELLER. I will read all of it, then.

The members of which shall be selected from civil life.

Is not that the language?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator tell me where it is, then?

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the Senator was familiar with the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I do not find anything imperative on the President, nothing mandatory; I find nothing here but discretionary power on the part of the President. What I desire by my amendment is that the President shall not guarantee these bonds, shall not take any steps to incur any liability on the part of the United States until it is determined what the canal will cost. It will cost $150,000,000, as some think. If that is not so, I have misunderstood the provision. I think there is nothing in the bill which will prohibit the President from going on if he sees fit to go on.

I do not wish to interrupt the Senator who has the floor, except to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have not seen the English influence of which the Senator from Alabama speaks. I am not myself particularly amenable to English influence, and I do not know that I am very much amenable to any other influence upon questions of this kind which I have been considering a long time. Nobody has approached me on the subject. I am not now contending that we should not build the canal, and am not now contending that these people have not a concession there that we are obliged to take care of if we build the canal. I am not antagonizing that. What I am complaining of in this bill is that, without sufficient data, without sufficient information, without knowing how this canal shall be built, we are to be committed to an expenditure of from $66,000,000, according to the company's statement, $135,000,000 according to the engineers' statement, and according to my impression from two hundred million to two hundred and fifty million dollars.

There is too much difference of opinion between the engineers of this company and the engineers whom we sent out; there is too much difference of opinion between the engineers who have studied this question and those who have been in control of this company to justify us in taking up the work and going on with it. Nobody, as I said before, knows whether, if we pass this bill, the company will commence to build the canal upon their plan or upon the plan of the Ludlow engineers, or upon what plan it will be built. There is the whole trouble in this matter. What I desire, and what I think is a prudent and proper amendment, is that before anything shall be done there shall be a careful examination.

The Senator from Alabama says this commission ran over the ground. The commissioners themselves say they did. They say they went over the ground with great haste and in a very unsatisfactory manner. The commission show, with all the maps, with all these data before them, that this company did not have certain data, without which I say here no private corporation which ever expected to complete a work of this kind would ever have undertaken. The idea is preposterous that a corporation should begin to build a dam more than 100 feet high without knowing what was the foundation upon which it was to be built when they made their estimates, that they should provide a waterway for 40,000 cubic feet per second when this board of engineers says that 150,000 feet will pass the weir in a second.

Mr. President, success is impossible under such circumstances. That is why I want to take up this report, and I want to show, not that this commission is right, but I desire to show that this company has not got and never has had the data that common engineering skill and common engineering prudence would require they should have before they expended a dollar. If they have any concession that is valuable the United States must pay for it. I am not contending as to the $4,000,000 which is proposed to be paid to them, for that is a bagatelle and amounts to nothing. The question is, Are we ready now to commit ourselves to a scheme which will cost $80,000,000, as the Senator says, and which the board say will cost $135,000,000? That is the question which I desire to present at some time. I do not desire, however, to interfere with anything else. If this bill is to be pressed, we must be heard on our side. That is all we shall ask. I am willing to say for myself that, after I have got through—I have no concern whether other people get through or not—I shall have no desire to delay the bill, but I certainly do not intend that this bill shall pass without at least putting on record my objections to it, which I think are not technical but fundamental.

Mr. CARTER. I submit two proposed amendments to the pending bill which I ask may be printed, so that the Senate may know their import.

Mr. MORGAN. Let them be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend section 3 by striking out in lines 12 and 13 the words "or that satisfactory arrangements have been made for the return and cancellation of said stock," and by striking out of lines 15 and 16 the words "or that satisfactory arrangements have been made for their redemption and cancellation;" by striking out from lines 20, 21, and 22 the words "or that provision has been made for the satisfaction and cancellation of said liabilities and contracts;" so that the section when amended shall be as follows:

"SEC. 3. That if the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua shall, within one year from the passage of this act, show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that all the stock of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua heretofore subscribed for or issued, except that heretofore issued to the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, has been called in, returned to, and canceled by the treasurer of the company, and that all bonds issued by said company and obligations to deliver bonds have been redeemed and canceled, and that all liabilities of the said company have been satisfied, and all contracts and agreements heretofore made by said company, including all contracts with the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company, have been canceled, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on behalf of the United States, subscribe for 700,000 shares of the capital stock of said company, and said company shall thereupon issue to the said Secretary of the Treasury of the United States 700,000 shares of the capital stock of said company herein provided for, to be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, which stock shall be issued in consideration of the guaranty by the United States of the bonds of said company hereinafter provided for, and shall be regarded as fully paid and nonassessable. In addition thereto 70,000 shares of nonassessable capital stock of said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua shall be issued and delivered to such person or persons as may be designated by those stockholders of the said company whose stock has been surrendered and canceled, as hereinbefore required."

Amend the bill entitled "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua,'" approved February 20, 1889, by striking out section 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, before proceeding with the discussion to-day, I wish to offer and have read a substitute which I intend to propose to this bill after I have reached the proper stage in the discussion to indicate the views which this substitute would represent in the legislation. I ask to have it read now and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That a commission of five persons, one from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, one from the Engineers of the Navy, and three other citizens of the United States, all to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby created, to be known as the Interoceanic Canal Commission; that the compensation of said board shall be fixed by the President, not to exceed $500 per month to each, including such pay as the engineers so selected are receiving for the time they are employed, from the Government. And the said board, under such arrangements and regulations as shall be made by the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall, the necessary permission therefor having been previously obtained from the Governments of the respective countries interested, visit and personally inspect the several lines or routes projected, or which may seem to said board to be sufficiently practicable to demand an inquiry, for an interoceanic canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and shall make or cause to be made all needful surveys, examinations, observations, and inquiries necessary to enable them to determine which is the most feasible, practicable, and economical route for the construction of a canal, and which, upon all the considerations entering into the subject, is, in their opinion, the most eligible, together with their reasons therefor; and also to make a report in reference to such route, of plans, profiles, sections, prisms, and specifications for its various parts, requisite to the construction and entire completion in a satisfactory manner of a canal sufficient to transport the vessels of all countries between said oceans, and also particular and complete estimates in full detail of the probable cost of such work upon the line or route so selected; and also to make such surveys, examinations, observations, and estimates of other lines or routes considered as competitive as may be necessary to distinguish and discriminate as compared with the same the eligibility of the route recommended.

For the purpose of securing the permission aforesaid, the President of the United States is authorized to make such negotiations with the Governments of the several countries whose territory may be embraced in a portion of any of said canal routes as to him shall seem advisable.

And for the purposes hereof there is hereby appropriated $1,000,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, before I notice some other things which have been said here to-day, I want to call attention to the very direct statement which was made by the distinguished and honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in regard to what he put into the RECORD last Friday. The Senator from Alabama has a favorite way of supposing that the opponents of his measures do not even know what the documents contain of which they speak, and is very ready to aver that they can not have understood or read them.

I said, sir, that the forty-eighth article of the concession provides for the expiration of the concession by its own terms of limitation, unless Nicaragua should grant an extension, on the 23d or 24th day of April next—I think it is one of those days of April, depending upon which day shall be considered the date from which the ten years run.

The Senator from Alabama thereupon very directly stated that this report showed that it had been already provided for, and that there was no right in Nicaragua to claim anything under the article. I thought I had read that report. I have reviewed it, and there is not a word in it that I am able to discover which relates to the forty-eighth article of the concession. I ask the Senator from Alabama to point out what it is in that report which he conceives in any manner affects that article. I recognize the fact that there was in the transactions between the company and Nicaragua and in the correspondence between our State Department and its officials and theirs, and in the declarations which some of the Nicaraguan officials have made, a relinquishment perhaps of the right to forfeit for some of the articles, but there is not one word in it which relates to the forty-eighth article that I have been able to discover. If there is, I should be glad to have it pointed out

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire that I shall point it out now?

Mr. VILAS. At the Senator's convenience, because I intend to discuss the point. I should like to know what there is that relates to it.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will refer to the first statement made by the president of the Maritime Canal Company in June, 1890, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, when that committee called him before them——

Mr. VILAS. Is the Senator about to read from the report of last Friday?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. If the Senator will notice the statement when the committee called him before them and examined him about this matter in executive session, he will find that the Government of Nicaragua would not consent that the work had been begun in accordance with the concession. Finally, after Mr. Blaine's intervention, it did consent that the concession as to the time of the beginning of the work had been entirely complied with. That postponed, necessarily, the time of the completion of the work from the date of the agreement, making it ten years in all. Eight years from that day would make it until the 23d day of next April, and ten years would bring it to the 23d of April, 1899. Mr. Blaine sent what Mr. Baker calls a very perpendicular sort of dispatch on that subject in these words:

The United States Government learns with surprise of rumors of an attempt to impair or deprive the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua of its rights as embodied in the contract granted by Nicaragua to that company. The United States can not understand how a company chartered under its laws should be treated with injustice by Nicaragua. You will please ascertain whence these disquieting rumors have arisen and communicate with me as soon as possible. You will also leave a copy of this dispatch with the Nicaraguan secretary of foreign affairs. The United States Government can not remain passive when the rights of a corporation organized under its laws are threatened with injustice.

That is the very point in issue at that time. Then afterwards Mr. Blaine telegraphed to Mr. Hitchcock as follows:

HITCHCOCK, Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York:

Mizner telegraphs: "All difficulties settled. Papers executed in triplicate. This Government will retain one."

BLAINE.

Guzman, the minister to this Government, on the same day telegraphed to Mr. Hitchcock:

Mr. HIRAM HITCHCOCK, New York:

I sincerely congratulate the company and yourself upon the good news received from Nicaragua.

H. GUZMAN.

Then Mr. Hitchcock, upon that day, sent to the President a dispatch:

His Excellency PRESIDENT OF NICARAGUA, Managua:

Please accept my sincere congratulations upon the happy termination of all differences and the company's assurance that it will vigorously prosecute the work of the canal in the interest of Nicaragua and the whole commercial world.

HIRAM HITCHCOCK, President.

On the 11th of October the following dispatch was received by the president of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua:

I congratulate myself jointly with you upon the happy settlement of the canal question, and with the greatest satisfaction I offer the cordial assistance of my Government to the efforts of the company for the realization of this grand enterprise.

Now, those are a part of the dispatches, which show exactly the time and the circumstances surrounding this recognition of the right of the company as having been established under the concession, proceeding for the full period of eight years from that time to complete the canal.

Mr. VILAS. It is as I supposed it was. All that relates to the forty-eighth article is a mere argument which the Senator from Alabama adduces from other things entirely, but which probably would be considered to have no just relation whatever to the article in question—the forty-eighth. I will speak of that by and by.

Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is not present for the moment, for I should like to call his attention to an inference which Senators might very properly draw from the question he put to me to-day. Yesterday more than an hour was taken out of the time which I might have enjoyed in the discussion of the bill by a similar question, and by proposing to the opponents of the bill to fix a time for a vote in every form in which ingenuity could suggest it, and by following it with various talk and discussion; and to-day, when another measure had occupied the attention of the Senate until nearly or quite 3 o'clock, we had a right to expect that we could go on with the discussion of the pending bill. Then comes this question about the time the discussion is to occupy, and an hour and twenty minutes have been consumed in consequent debate, mainly by the friends of the bill. I called attention to the fact yesterday that it was a week ago last Thursday when I first solicited the privilege of being heard, and that I had not been able to be heard since; and it would seem as though, if there were a charge of filibustering, to use a very harsh word, which first fell from the lips of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on that day, Thursday a week, it ought to be aimed at those who would seem to be filibustering to prevent a fair discussion by the opponents of the bill.

We are ready to take up any other measure. We are not standing in the way of any other measure. We are only opposing this measure. If the Senate wishes to take up any other measure, we are willing. No opponent of the bill has ever made an objection to its being laid aside informally at any time, so that if anything else was desired to be presented to the Senate it could be; and yet, with the fact stated to the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is to be the premier of the next Administration, that the bill can not become a law at this session of Congress, and that therefore everything we do here is uselessly done, except as it is the expression of the Senate's opinion, it is insisted that the bill shall be kept before the Senate while the other legislation which is of consequence, vastly greater consequence than the mere passage by the Senate of this bill could be, shall lose the opportunity of consideration. Let the fault, if that be fault, abide where it belongs, not with us.

I trust, sir, that it will not be continually insisted, day after day, when the opponents of the bill desire respectfully to urge their objections against it, that we shall have these questions put, insinuating or seeming to insinuate to the public that an unworthy motive governs our desire to debate it. I saw it stated this morning in a newspaper to which I have been in the habit of looking for correct reports of the proceedings of Congress that the remarks which I submitted to the Senate yesterday were intended to consume time, whereas there was not a Senator who listened to them who did not know that they were addressed pertinently and properly to the bill before us.

Now, sir, I propose to continue the discussion, and to pursue the line of argument upon which I entered yesterday. Let me recall for one moment summarily that I had pointed out that the bill, aside from buying out the stock of the present Maritime Company, proposed to put the United States into that corporation, and not in its sovereign capacity, but in a fictitious corporate capacity, to proceed to construct at its own cost and risk the canal as an enterprise of its own, pure and simple. Then I entered upon a consideration of the reasons which were proffered to us why the United States should assume that great undertaking, and I was considering, at the time when we went into executive session, the argument that it should be built as a military auxiliary to the national defense. I think I had shown that neither in a state of neutralization in time of war nor in a state of exclusive control by the United States in time of war—and one or the other of those conditions is practically inevitable—could the canal be a source of strength, but in either case would be a source of weakness, considered from a military standpoint.

I then asked—and at that point the Senate chose to go into executive session—what was the theory of the utility of the canal as a military auxiliary entertained by the friends of the bill. It is obvious at once that it consists in a single feature—that our ships of war might pass to and fro between the eastern and the western coasts.

Mr. TELLER. How about the war ships of other nations?

Mr. VILAS. As I argued yesterday, they must pass if the canal is neutralized; and if it is not neutralized, it becomes a far greater element of weakness in our hands. But I was considering simply the question of utility to us.

Why do we care to pass our ships of war between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts? For the defense of the Pacific coast or the defense of the Atlantic coast? The Pacific coast, as I was saying at the conclusion yesterday afternoon, is already defended by nature far better than by ships of war. There lie the immense leagues of the ocean wastes, and who on this floor can conceive that any enemy likely to imperil the United States in her dominion of the Pacific Slope can cross that great sea, justly named the Pacific, because it is impossible that humanity should engage in practical warfare across the space which it occupies?

Sir, let us turn for a moment to the Atlantic coast. Where are our enemies to assail us on the Atlantic coast? To do it they must cross 8,000 miles of sea. I have heard the distinguished Senator from Alabama, when under the dominion of that fear of England which he sometimes illustrates by speeches on the floor, speak, and I believe I use the very word he adopted, of a cordon of outposts which England is gradually establishing in terrible menace to our safety, beginning with Halifax and the eastern shores of Canada on our northeast, thence to Jamaica on our southeast, and to Honduras, and then threatening to take the Sandwich Islands, and thus at last enveloping the United States in a very surrounding of imminent peril. But, sir, I do not fail to recall that more than one hundred years ago, when we were but three millions in number and had neither ships nor armies, this people, with their stout hearts, were able not only to begin a war with England for their independence, but to achieve it under the help of Divine Providence. I do not forget that since that time they again declared war upon that, the greatest naval power of the world, and that even upon the great sea, where our brave men encountered their immense naval establishments, we had the honor of such glorious victories as that won by Hull and that won by Porter, and of such a glorious defeat as Lawrence sank to death in achieving.

From that time to this, what has been our peril of war with any European power? Now, not with three million, as during our war of independence, nor eight or ten million, as in the next war, but with 75,000,000 people in thriving industry over this continent from ocean to ocean, with works of civilization such as no other equal surface of the world has ever before seen to such an extent in like time, with as many miles of railroad binding us together as all the rest of the world besides possesses substantially, is it necessary for us to begin to tremble and shiver lest some enemy come across the sea to threaten our safety?

What has been the history of armadas? The most notable effort that was ever made to invade a foreign land by ocean was when Spain undertook to seize the fair realm of the virgin Queen of England, and that colossal naval array, sent with such circumstances of apparent power as to threaten, seemingly, the absolute doom of that solitary island, was dissipated by tempests and the ships of England. Afterwards, sir, the greatest genius of war who has ever, perhaps, contended against England, no farther distant from her than across the English Channel, looked upon that island with the eye of one fertile in military resources, and could find no way by which he could dare to launch a naval expedition with promise of success, and though he marshaled his armies at Cologne, and though he built ships for a long time, yet when the hour of practicable trial came he never attempted it. What have we to fear that should make us now go abroad to the isthmus that separates the northern and southern continents of America to build a canal to defend the United States from attack?

Sir, we have a great deal of this sort of bugaboo. It has been a favorite argument with some who are interested in building up a navy for us, and some who are interested in spending millions upon fortifications along our coast, as if we could fortify seven or eight thousand miles of seacoast in any better way than by the stout hearts of the men who will defend this country should anybody ever dare to invade it with hostile purpose.

We have nothing to guide us to safety better than an honorable, a wise, a humane, and a generous policy of national intercourse. Let us deal with even approximate fairness with the nations of the earth and we encounter no risk of armed controversy with any of them. Indeed, we have had every evidence that they will bear much before they will resent an attempt of the United States to encroach upon their rights, or even to injure their sensibilities. Whoever else may be deluded by this proposal, his is indeed and in truth a delusion; who thinks we ought to build a canal as a military auxiliary, he is fitted, it seems to me, for the ranks of those who fear the doom of earth by fire is nigh, and might well enlist under Lieutenant Totten.

But, sir, there is one consideration which justifies a serious, careful, and painstaking examination, for it possesses great force to favor the Government's entertainment of the project of this canal, and that consideration is that it may afford sufficient advantages to ships of commerce to warrant its cost, and that no private concern, no corporation, will or can build it. That has been tested sufficiently. The enthusiasts of sixty years past who have dreamed of this project and have fancied it a thing capable of construction and useful to build have always awaked from their dreams under the cooler and more sedate application of financial common sense.

Now, sir, is there justification for the United States to undertake this work in the fact, or the probability, that the commerce of this country will be sufficient to warrant it? If there be, that is the basis on which we should enter upon it. We should construct the canal, having made proper international arrangements, precisely as we built the locks at St. Marie, or as we dredged the St. Clair River, in order that commerce shall be benefited adequately, so that immediately the citizens of our country will receive gains, some a hundredfold and some mayhap tenfold, which on the whole will redound to the general advantage of all.

I propose to ask a few moments of the Senate to consider what the commerce is that will be benefited by the canal. I shall not affirm anything of my own information. I shall take the statistics which the committee have furnished. Let us look at it in the light which they cast over it.

On page 136 of the report which was submitted to the Fifty-first Congress by the Committee on Foreign Relations is a table of "Commerce subject to the attraction of the canal." I shall ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD at this point this table, although I will not now trouble the Senate to hear it read, being able to indicate the general features of it sufficiently otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

* Value, not reported; weight, 65,300,000 kilos, say about 65,300 tons.

Mr. VILAS. The table sets forth, after a considerable preliminary discussion of the sources and value of its statistics, the figures which indicate the amount in total of the commerce which would pass through that canal, or which would be subject to the attraction of the canal, as the phrase is; that is to say, that would be liable to pass through it: First, with Great Britain and her various dependencies and the foreign countries with which she trades. Next with France and her dependencies. Then with Germany and the countries with which she trades, including some islands in the Pacific seas that belong to her; and finally with the trade of the United States with foreign countries that would pass to and from Atlantic or Pacific ports.

The total of the entire commerce that is said to be liable to enjoy that canal is given at $825,110,167. Of that commerce this table shows that of Great Britain directly to aggregate $498,421,678; of France, $27,184,683; of Germany, $124,033,702; of the United States, $175,470,104; aggregating the total named.

Thus, according to the table, the United States will, in the opinion of the friends of the pending measure, enjoy for its commerce only about one-fifth of the commercial advantages which it will have provided at immense risk and immense cost. Its commerce, so depicted in the most favorable manner by the friends of the bill, will be but a little over 21 per cent of all which share the canal. Nay, sir, less than that, for it will be seen, when particular attention is given to the statement, that of the commerce reckoned as belonging to the United States the greater part is commerce between the United States and foreign countries, so that one-half of it may as fairly be said to be the commerce of foreign countries as of the United States. Probably a just deduction from that table would indicate that the United States would not enjoy above 12 to 15 per cent at the utmost of the commercial advantages which it shall have thus provided entirely alone. It would be well, also, to reflect upon the fact, in that connection, that by reason of our navigation laws the far greater part of our foreign commerce is transported in foreign bottoms.

Now, sir, on the other hand, take Great Britain. The share in the commercial advantages to be provided by that canal which Great Britain will enjoy is nearly five-eighths. When we consider her interest in the commerce, reckoned as transacted with the United States, it is still more than five-eighths; most probably it would be three-fourths.

Next comes Germany. The share of Germany according to that table will be 15 per cent and upward, lacking only 6 per cent of an equality with that of the United States, even according to the figures shown by the committee.

Now, I know that sometimes we hear much said of the great advantage which may be derived to our commerce passing between Atlantic and Pacific ports. In 1880 a very interesting and instructive book was printed by the United States containing figures on this subject made up by the then Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Mr. Nimmo, and he shows that the quantity of commerce passing between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts by water has been constantly growing less. He gives a total of the value of the commodities shipped from New York to San Francisco and from San Francisco to New York via Panama each year from 1868 to 1879, inclusive, and it diminished in total aggregate from $70,000,000 in 1869 to less than $5,000,000 in 1879. The entire value of the commerce which sought water transit with the aid of the Panama Railroad fell to a point only about one-sixteenth of what it was ten years preceding. What has been the subsequent fall, I am unable to state.

Well, sir, we know something of the reason why. Since 1868 the Pacific railroads have been in active operation. We have a very pertinent illustration in the history of traffic since those roads were built of the probable value of a line of vessels between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

On the tables of Senators will be found Document No. 52 of this very session, submitted by the Secretary of the Interior to the Senate, in which is given copies of the various contracts made by the Pacific railroads with the Panama Steamship Company whereby whatever competition that line afforded for the relief of the shippers of articles of merchandise to and fro was entirely extinguished, and for which the Union Pacific paid them in the course of a few years nearly $2,000,000, and the Central Pacific over $2,200,000.

That illustrates the probable benefit from our expending two or three hundred million dollars to establish a line of water communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific ports.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TURPIE. I suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chilton,	Hawley,	Pugh,
Allison,	Clark,	Hoar,	Roach,
Bacon,	Cockrell,	Lindsay,	Shoup,
Baker,	Cullom,	Lodge,	Smith,
Bate,	Daniel,	McMillan,	Stewart,
Berry,	Davis,	Mantle,	Vilas,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Mills,	Walthall,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Wetmore,
Caffery,	Gibson,	Pasco,	White.
Cannon,	Gorman,	Peffer,
Carter,	Gray,	Perkins,
Chandler,	Hansbrough,	Pettigrew,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the roll shows 45 Senators present. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, on the point I was discussing I wish also to interpose——

Mr. MILLS. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. VILAS. I will.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be allowed to proceed. I know his anxiety to get on with his speech, and I hope he will not be interrupted by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. This is one of the worst days of the season; it is going to be a very bad night; we shall have to go home after awhile, and some of us are very old.

Mr. ALDRICH. But I trust the Senator has some regard for the feelings of the Senator from Wisconsin, who has been on the floor and is anxious to proceed.

Mr. MILLS. I have consulted the Senator from Wisconsin. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 3, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HITT, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair, and proceeded to the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10134) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

Mr. HITT. I give notice that further on I shall ask to go back to line 5, on page 13, and to change the word "seven" to "five." It is not now in order to do that, because it is a footing, and it will not be the correct footing if an amendment which I shall offer further on is adopted.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read as follows:

CLASS IV.

At $2,500 per annum.

Mr. PEARSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 24, the words "two thousand five hundred" and inserting "two thousand nine hundred and thirty-three."
Also, by striking out all of Schedule C, class 7.

The CHAIRMAN. Class VII has not yet been reached.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman will withhold the point of order, I will state that this amendment of mine is necessarily a compound amendment, because I anticipated the point of order. The effect of the amendment will not be to increase the appropriation, but rather to reduce it, but it will distribute the appropriation in such a way as to give these consuls in class 4 a more adequate salary, and it will have the effect of simply abolishing all of the salaries in class 7.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman state his amendment? I could not hear it.

Mr. PEARSON. The amendment is practically to abolish all of these salaries in Class VII, and to add the amount of those salaries, pro rata, to the salaries in class 4, the $2,500 salaries.

Mr. HITT. To increase the $2,500 salaries and to omit the whole of Class VII?

Mr. PEARSON. And to omit the other. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that my main purpose is to do away altogether with Class VII, not only because those salaries are inadequate to pay an American consul so that he can live with comfort to himself and with credit to this Government, but mainly because those consuls are allowed to engage in trade; and I do not believe that it should be one of the purposes of this Government to send its citizens abroad to acquire information for their individual benefit, rather than for the benefit of the American people at large. They ought either to be paid adequate salaries or their salaries ought to be abolished. I can speak with some knowledge on this point, and with some feeling, because I endeavored in my younger days to serve this Government, and I found that, although a bachelor and rather economical, I could not possibly live on $1,500 a year, even paid in gold, and I know that these men who are paid $1,000 a year are either incompetent, or else they are transacting business on their own account and doing no good to the public service.

Mr. HITT. Touching the last point, the abolishing of all salaries of $1,000, the gentleman has not stated how he would have those officers compensated. Would it be by fees?

Mr. PEARSON. Under the regulations of the State Department they could be compensated by fees; and if the chairman will notice, there are three of these places where the fees exceed $1,000, and those are perhaps places where some good could be accomplished. In other places——

Mr. HITT. In one of those places the consul is salaried at $1,000, and he gets nearly as much more in fees.

Mr. PEARSON. Exactly so.

Mr. HITT. He is now getting that.

Mr. PEARSON. I understand that. There are three places where the fees exceed $1,000.

Mr. HITT. And the consul keeps the fees.

Mr. PEARSON. Certainly. And I wish that they were all paid as much as $2,500 a year. I think the representatives of this Government should be paid definite, well-known salaries, and nothing else; that all the fees received should be covered into the Treasury, so that a man would know exactly what to expect.

Mr. Chairman, I forgot to state in this connection that if this amendment of mine should escape that threatened point of order, it will have the effect of lifting 30 of these consuls out of the order which has lately been promulgated by the Secretary of State, and that instead of having 30 free-silver and free-trade Democrats in office for life, we shall at least have an opportunity here and there to put in a Republican and a protectionist.

Mr. HITT. Before the gentleman makes his point of order, I will say just a word on the point the gentleman raises as to the barriers to removal or conditions of appointment depending on an order. That order can be rescinded at any time or modified. Similar orders have been issued before, that is, on such subjects, and in a degree, though not in the exact sense now given. With the change of the personnel in the State Department it may, it is not unlikely, be somewhat modified, because men do not always take the same view. It is not a law we are talking of, nor a provision of the Constitution. Further, on the question of notarial fees and whether they should be considered in fixing the pay of a consul, I was asked a question on yesterday by the gentleman from Missouri not present at this moment. It is quite probable that in adjusting the service and its methods, in the changes that will be initiated, when they will come to be considered and perfected by those soon to be in charge, there will be a consideration of the notarial fees in determining the compensation of consuls. That ought to be done; but at the present time I do not know just what the fees are. The rule or scale establishing them has just been promulgated. I have here in the State Department register the notarial fees reported in 1894–95; but there is no certainty what will be the amount next year under the new scale, and I am willing to trust the wise discretion of those to be in charge of that Department for the suggestion of a proper measure.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PEARSON. There has been a new schedule or tariff of official fees promulgated by the State Department?

Mr. HITT. No.

Mr. PEARSON. I am somewhat in the dark myself, and I desire to say, in justice——

Mr. HITT. There is a new tariff, if the gentleman will permit me, promulgated, directed to be publicly exhibited in every consulate, of the notarial fees—not the official fees which go into the Treasury. It is for the first time promulgated; but as to the regular fees, they are about as they have always been.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I am necessarily in the dark upon this question, because my application to the State Department for information on this point has been met by a declaration of this kind from the Assistant Secretary:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 30, 1897.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 28th instant, I have the honor to inform you that the supply of the volume of the Consular Regulations allowed by law is not more than sufficient for the needs of the Department and of the consular corps, but Congress has been asked to provide for the printing of a large number of copies, to be sold to the commercial classes and others interested.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. W. ROCKHILL,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. RICHMOND PEARSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I presume that the words "commercial classes and others interested" refer to our humble selves. The suggestion is blandly made that, if we furnish the money for publication, the Secretary of State will graciously sell the book to us and others interested. At any rate, I have only for a moment been able to glance at that book, by the kindness of the chairman of the committee, and in that I find a new tariff of fees.

Mr. HITT. Of notarial fees?

Mr. PEARSON. Of notarial and official fees.

Mr. HITT. I have not made a comparison in detail of the schedule of official fees now issued and that in the old edition of the Consular Regulations. The official fees go to the Government anyhow, except in the small consulates without salaries, which are paid only by fees.

Mr. PEARSON. I think the gentleman will find there is a new schedule of fees altogether.

Mr. HITT. There has been a reduction in amount of receipts from the fee for the oath, which has been nearly abolished.

Mr. MILES. As I understood from the gentleman from North Carolina, it was that those who are occupying these consular positions were subject to the general provisions of the civil-service law.

Mr. HITT. They are not under the civil-service act.

Mr. MILES. But these men are designated by the President, and then afterwards, in pursuance of his order, they are subjected to an examination.

Mr. HITT. That is the fact.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Clerk to read the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order against the amendment because it changes existing law, and is therefore in opposition to the second section of Rule XXI. But before I discuss the point of order, I desire to refer to some statements made by the gentleman from North Carolina. I do not desire to misrepresent him; but my opinion is that the gentleman seeks by this amendment to take Class IV out of the scope and meaning of the Executive order issued from the State Department in regard to consuls and commercial agents.

Mr. STEELE. Does not the gentleman think he ought to?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The salaries of consuls in Class IV have been for many years $2,500 per annum. Now, an order has been issued by the State Department, in pursuance of the Executive order, which some persons think will keep certain consuls in office, and it seems that some of our friends in this House wince.

We have had a civil-service law for a number of years. We had a civil-service law when I came to Congress twelve years ago. That law was passed by a Republican Congress, and was approved by a Republican President. The scope of the civil-service law has been extended from time to time by Republican Presidents, but now, when a Democratic President extends the scope of that law, or when he seeks to enforce a statute which has been in force since 1871, and under which the order referred to was made, there seems to be "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth." I do not see any more ground for sorrow or indignation now because the civil-service law is somewhat extended by the President than there was a few years ago, when it was extended to embrace all the railway postal clerks, several thousands in number. I know that when I first came to Congress I was occasionally notified by the Postmaster-General, or by the chief of the Railway Mail Service, that I could select a postal clerk, but I have received no such notice within the last four years.

Mr. STEELE. May I ask the gentleman a question? What is your opinion of the civil-service law as a whole?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I did not vote for the civil-service law. I was not in Congress when it was passed. There might be a civil-service law framed that I might not disapprove as much as I do the present civil-service law.

Mr. STEELE. That is my opinion of it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. But I want to say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that the extension made under the Executive order referred to was not made under the general civil-service law, but was made under an act of Congress passed March 3, 1871, which I will read:

Vacancies occurring in any grade of consulates or clerkships in the Departments may be filled either by transfer from some other grade of service, clerical, consular, or diplomatic, under the Department of State, or by the appointment of some person who has previously served under the Department of State to its satisfaction, or by the appointment of some person who has made application to the Secretary of State, with proper certificates of character, responsibility, and capacity in the manner provided for applications for consulates of which the annual compensation is more than $1,000 and less than $3,000, and who has, on examination, been found qualified for the position.

That is the statute under which the order was made, and my friend from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] in offering this amendment fixing the salaries at $2,999 each has simply sought to evade the Executive order. The object of the amendment, it seems, is to open the way for good places for gentlemen who desire to be consuls and who are friends of members of Congress.

Now, as this order has been made, and as there are good men in these offices, I see no reason why we should not try the order for a while. I will say, however, to the gentleman from North Carolina that this is not the first time that the President of the United States has attempted to put the consulates under the civil service. In 1866 the Department of State promulgated an order requiring all applicants for consulships to present themselves at the Department for examination. Again, in 1873, there was an Executive order issued under the act of 1871, but it was short-lived.

In order that our Republican friends may fully understand the law regulating appointments in the consular service, I call attention to section 1753 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which authorizes the President—

To prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability, for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries, and may prescribe their duties and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointments in the civil service.

Mr. PEARSON. Is it not a fact that all those now in class 4 had not any qualification except their Democracy?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. No, sir; that is not a fact. I assert here that the consular force now in the service will compare favorably with, if they do not excel, the Republican consuls that were in the service during the four years preceding Mr. Cleveland's accession to office; and the gentleman is very much mistaken when he implies that no other qualification is required except being a Democrat.

Mr. PEARSON. My point is that they were not required to pass any examination.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. They were not required to be examined before they went into the service, and neither were the eight or ten thousand male and female clerks then in the Departments at Washington required to be examined when the civil-service law went into effect.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him? Instead of eight or ten thousand there were about 18,000 male and female clerks.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I accept the correction. When the Republican party passed the civil-service law, the clerks then in office were not required to be examined, but now, when we come here and simply ask to have continued in the service consuls to the number of 196—for that is the whole number embraced within the scope of the order—gentlemen hold up their hands in horror. When, as against 18,000 clerks thus retained in office by the Republicans, we ask for the retention of 196 consular officers, our friends on the other side become furiously excited and begin to fret and grieve over the promulgation of the President's order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, unless he desires to discuss the point of order.

Mr. HITT. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I make the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON]. It changes existing law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to correct him in a matter of some importance? I wish to call his attention to a fact which seems to me to entirely contradict his principal statement. He says, as I understand him, that President Harrison extended the civil-service order over some 18,000 offices. The exact facts are that President Harrison, during his four years, extended the civil-service law over 6,890 offices, and that President Cleveland has already extended it over 40,371, and is now trying to extend it over more than 30,000 others.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman from Ohio corroborates the statement I made. I said that Mr. Harrison, as President, had extended the civil-service law over thousands of offices, and the gentleman admits it. Now, the President of the United States has promulgated an order simply doing that which the Republican President had previously done and Republican Congresses had authorized, and gentlemen on the other side are indignant.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not talking about that. I am correcting your figures.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. You simply corroborate what I have said.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is a slight difference between 8,000 and 18,000, but that is about as nearly accurate——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman would come a little closer, I could hear what he is saying, and he might hear what I am saying.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman said 18,000.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I said there were 18,000 in the Departments in Washington.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say 8,000, and I defy contradiction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not familiar with the controversy which is going on just now, but as I passed through the Hall a few moments since I heard the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] state that there were 8,000 or 10,000 clerks in the Departments at Washington. I wish to say that according to a census of the Departments taken May 24, 1893, by a joint commission authorized to investigate the various Departments, there were then, in exact numbers, 17,599 persons employed in the Departments.

Mr. HITT. That included messengers, laborers, etc.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, yes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I stated that there were about 10,000 clerks and other persons employed in the Departments, and the gentleman from Missouri interrupted me and said there were 18,000. But the point I wanted to make was that when the civil-service law was passed the incumbency of those persons was not interrupted nor were they required to be examined.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. ADAMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear any further discussion on the point of order. After that is disposed of, any gentleman will be recognized who wishes to discuss the amendment. As the Chair understands, these salaries are fixed by law at $2,500. The amendment proposes to increase them to $3,900 in round numbers. That would be a change of the existing law for the year; and the Chair sustains the point of order as to that part of the amendment. As to the other part of the amendment, which applies to Schedule C, Class VII, that part of the amendment will not be in order until we reach the paragraph to which it applies.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the latter part of the amendment, which proposes to strike out all of Schedule C, Class VII, be in order as a separate proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. After that paragraph is read the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] to offer any amendment, and then any point of order which may be raised will be decided. The point of order applicable to the amendment to the pending paragraph is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk (resuming the reading of the bill) read the following:

Mexico: Consul at Paso del Norte.

Mr. HITT. I move to amend by striking out "Paso del Norte" and inserting "Ciudad Juarez," which is the correct name.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk (resuming the reading of the bill) read the following:

Consuls at Horgen and Zurich.

Mr. HITT. I move to amend by striking out the words "Horgen and," and also the letter "s" at the end of the word "consuls." The clause will then read "Consul at Zurich." The reason for this change is that the consulate at Horgen is not deemed necessary on account of the change in the amount of business. It was once a feed agency; then this consulate, which had for a long time a rising business, was finally made a salaried office. Horgen is only 12 miles from Zurich, and it could be an agency of the Zurich office. Under the arrangement proposed the pay at Horgen will be the fees, amounting to about $800, and the office there will be dependent upon the office at Zurich.

The Clerk (resuming the reading of the bill) read as follows:

Mexico: Consuls at Matamoras, Progreso, and Nogales.

Mr. HITT. I move to amend the spelling by striking out the last "a" in Matamoras and inserting "o."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE C.

CLASS VII.

At $1,000 per annum:
Belgium: Consul at Ghent.
France and French Dominions: Consul at Nantes.
Germany: Consul at Stettin.
Great Britain and British Dominions: Consuls at Gaspe Basin (Canada), Sierra Leone (West Africa), and Windsor (Nova Scotia).
Haiti: Consul at Cape Haitien.
Honduras: Consul at Utilla and Truxillo (to reside at Utilla).
Italy: Consul at Turin.
Netherlands: Consul at Batavia.
Portuguese Dominions: Consul at Lourenço Marquez (Africa).
Society Islands: Consul at Tahiti.
Sweden and Norway: Consul at Christiania.

Mr. PEARSON. I move to amend by striking out Schedule C, Class VII, as just read.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Upon that amendment I make the point of order which I have already indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina changes existing law. We have embodied in our laws, at the present time, a provision providing for the consulates at the various places named in clause 7, Schedule C; and these officials are now on duty and receiving the compensation fixed by law. It is a part of the existing law.

The gentleman from North Carolina proposes to modify that law—to strike it from the bill altogether; to make no provision for the salary, and hence to abolish these consulates. Therefore the proposition to strike from the bill the whole provision embodied in this clause—Schedule C, Class VII—is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that he does not think this proposition changes existing law. It is not a change of existing law simply to refuse to make an appropriation. It does not abolish the office, but only fails to provide a salary for it. It does not abolish the salary, although it makes no provision for the payment of it. The Chair thinks, therefore, that the point of order is not well taken and overrules it.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed now to address myself for a few moments to the merits of the amendment. The effect of the adoption of the amendment will be to abolish the consulates named in this schedule, "C." And, by the way, they are not American citizens, as a rule. An American citizen can not possibly live decently in a foreign country on a salary of $1,000 a year. In fact, he can not reach his post of duty, unless he goes in the steerage, or possibly he may succeed in "beating" his way there. But the salary and allowance would not enable him to reach his destination traveling first class. The allowance is not sufficient to pay his traveling expenses and maintenance while there. The effect of the amendment would be, therefore, to strike out this class altogether.

By reason of the meagerness of the salary allowed, as I have said, American citizens can not fill the position of consuls at these thirteen little places; and, as a matter of fact, they are nearly all held by foreigners, as the names will show. If gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the Register of the Department of State they will find that there are 520 names of persons in the consular service of the United States who are foreigners. I am opposed to that idea, Mr. Chairman, and I think the House is opposed to it. If we must pay our consuls, let us send them as Great Britain does, send competent men and pay a sufficient salary for the service, and at the same time make them subject to promotion for efficiency in their work.

I find that the lowest salary paid by France to its consuls is $2,400 a year, and this runs up all the way to $8,000 in intermediate grades. I also find that Great Britain pays a compensation ranging from $5,000 to $12,500, and there is no country on the civilized earth that expects one of its citizens to go abroad and live on a meager pittance of $1,000 a year except ours. It is an insult to a man to propose it.

I trust, therefore, the amendment will prevail. It will leave three of these places in better position than they are now. The consul at Ghent will become consular agent there under the supervision of the consul at Antwerp. The fees there last year were $1,812, which is more than the salary of the consul. The consul at Stettin will get a little over $1,000, and perhaps the consul at Christiania, the only other important place, will have somewhat larger compensation.

But my point is that we should not allow these men, our consuls, who represent the United States, to compete in trade as merchants in opposition to our American citizens whom they are sent abroad to serve.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I omitted a point I desired to present when I was interrupted, and I hope the Chair will excuse me for a moment while I make the statement that I had intended to make before I got through discussing the question of order.

The effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina to do away with the appointment of consuls in Class VII is, I think, to change existing law. These consuls are now paid $1,000 per annum, and if the amendment prevails and becomes a law the consuls at these various places will be paid in fees; that is, the consul at Ghent, instead of getting $1,000, which he now receives, will get $2,500; and that was the reason I claimed that this was a change of existing law.

Mr. HITT. He gets $2,068 now.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. He is in the $1,000 class.

Mr. HITT. Yes; but he gets $1,068 in fees.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. But the whole amount of fees, as shown in the report of the Auditor for the State and other Departments, amounts to $3,415, and the consul in Ghent will receive an amount if the amendment passes different from the amount he is now receiving.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the question of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled on the question.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I only wanted to call the attention of the Chair to it. I am not going to appeal from the ruling.

Responding to the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, and the effect of the amendment if it shall be enacted into a law, I state that long years of trial and experience have proved that it is best to have consuls in Class VII, embracing as it does some twelve or fifteen consulates, receive a salary of $1,000 a year each, to be paid together with certain fees referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

In the bill under consideration there are eight consulates which have been reported which, recommended by the Secretary of State, are to be changed from feed to salaried posts. Some of them will be reached by this proposed amendment. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be any change made in the existing law. I think those consulates which we have placed in Class VII, and to which we allow a salary of $1,000, should remain there. Of course it is evident that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] desires to have Class VII stricken out, because it is now embraced in the Executive order. He no doubt desires that he and some of his associates may have an opportunity to have their friends appointed to consulates named in Class VII.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say that we would not have any such offices as those, any of us?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. You have just been told that they are worth $2,000 a year, and you have many constituents who would like $2,000 places.

Mr. PEARSON. They would not take the responsibility of those $1,000 places.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] desires that the order issued a few days ago, to which many references have been made, should be set aside, it can be done by the Executive; and if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] desires that there should be a change, he can apply to the next President. I hope, therefore, that this House will not change the existing law.

Mr. HULICK. What is the opinion of the gentleman, if this amendment should prevail, as to the effect it will have upon our commercial interests?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I believe, and I have no doubt that my friend [Mr. HITT], who has been on the Committee on Foreign Affairs with me for many years, will agree with me, at those places some of the consuls now get a thousand dollars and a certain part of the fees. If the amendment prevails, then the amount they will receive will be very insignificant at some places, and in the interests of commerce, I think those consulates should remain as they are.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. PEARSON. I should like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky as to whether he believes that an American consul ought to be allowed to engage in trade?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If I had the power, Mr. Chairman, I would, as far as possible, change the law so that every consul would receive only a salary and the fees collected by consuls be paid into the Treasury, and the object of the law for years has been to increase the number of salaried consuls and reduce the number of feed consuls. In this very bill under consideration to-day, we take eight consulates out of the feed list and put them on the salaried list, and yet my friend from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] now seeks to put about fifteen or sixteen more back into the feed list. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, simply to preserve the truth of history, and not with a view of influencing the vote on this amendment, I desire to call attention to the fact that on the 24th of May, 1893, under the then existing law, there were 17,599 persons authorized to be employed in the various Departments of the Government service at Washington, of which number 11,667 were males and 5,637 females. Five thousand six hundred and ten had relatives in the public service. Four thousand one hundred and fifty-one had 1 relative each, 1,037 had 2 relatives each, 279 had 3 relatives each, 96 had 4 relatives each, 37 had 5 relatives each, 10 had 6 relatives each, 4 had 7 relatives each, 5 had 8 relatives each, and 2 had 9 relatives each. This makes a total, as heretofore stated, of 5,610 persons who had relatives in the public service. Eight thousand and twenty-seven were subject to competitive civil-service examination, and of the whole 17,599 persons authorized to be employed only 3,265 had entered the public service under the provisions of the civil-service law requiring an examination.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Leaving how many who were not examined in order to obtain positions in the Departments?

Mr. DOCKERY. At that time 17,599 persons were authorized to be employed in the various Departments of the public service——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And how many had been examined?

Mr. DOCKERY. And of that number only 3,265 had entered the public service under the civil-service law, and after examination.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to have a vote, and I will only remark before the vote is taken that the spirit of the gentleman who moves the amendment is one with which I heartily sympathize. An appointment to an office at the end of the earth, on a salary of $1,000, is scarcely more than an indignity. Many of these appointees are foreigners, but not a foreigner is in our service at any place where an American can be found who will do the work—not one. A Secretary of State who would appoint such men or a member of Congress who would recommend such a man when a fit American can be found is himself unfit for American citizenship.

But if the salaries are taken from them they will have only the fees. They are very small. And then these officers will be allowed, as now, to go into trade, when they may verify their own invoices. I regret that the spirit that suggested the amendment can not be carried out, but the amendment ought not to be adopted, for, bad as the system is, it is better than nothing.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I did not hear the statement of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yielded to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it is not a fact that at this time, and for many years past, there are a large number of vice-consuls or consular agents who are not citizens of this country, but are citizens of other countries?

Mr. HITT. The larger part of them, I think, are citizens or subjects of other governments.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that if the Government of the United States would pay a reasonable compensation these offices could all be filled by American citizens?

Mr. HITT. The objection to that, however, should be stated.

The fees are so small and the duties so trivial that it is not fair to charge the people of the United States with a salary to keep a man in office in a city where the commerce with this country is so small that the invoice fees would bring in a revenue of but $20; there are agencies where there are not a dozen invoices in three months. Yet it is an accommodation to have some one there to do the business when necessary. The consul or consul-general at the principal post finds some respectable person in the small place willing to act as consular agent, some man of good character, who is willing to transact that business for Americans who go there. Men of high standing will sometimes do this for the sake of the official character it gives and the name consul on their cards. It gives a certain prestige in foreign countries, and in that way good business men are found who will accept a petty consular agency; but where the revenues are only $20 a year we can not afford to give a man a salary of $1,500. The gentleman from Ohio, and I also, would resist such an imposition on the taxpayers.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am in favor of the gentleman's bill and against the amendment.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. My colleague made a statement concerning the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina. I want to ask him whether he opposes that amendment or was in favor of it?

Mr. HITT. I sympathize with the motive of the gentleman who protested against a commission being given to an American citizen under those circumstances, but not with the amendment.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And you are opposed to the amendment?

Mr. HITT. I am opposed to the amendment, and I trust it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to state my judgment, and I am willing to yield my judgment to that of the distinguished chairman of the committee generally, but I think if he will examine the question as to these consular agents, who, he says, are better than nothing, he would decide, as I have decided long ago, that we would be better off without them. Now, it is not a mere matter of speculation with me. I had a commission in 1891 which directed me to call upon these gentlemen, by correspondence or in person, with the hope of promoting the great exhibition at Chicago. I addressed myself to every consular agent in Europe. I received answers which I filed with my report and a large number of my letters. These letters were requests to cooperate with the consuls in the promotion of American interests. Nineteen out of twenty of them discouraged all action, and they were often actively engaged in doing everything in their power to prevent the contribution of exhibits by England and by foreign competitors with our exhibitors here. They were the organized enmity to the Chicago Exposition. They had the narrow-minded provincialism that was exhibited in one or two cities of Europe, and they were a positive detriment, so far as that enterprise was concerned, in a very large number of cases. Therefore I believe that to give these men any sort of authority by the United States is to simply give them a power and prestige generally used against the business interests of this country.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio answer a question which I feel very much at heart? That is, to the matter of allowing this class, only thirteen of them, to engage in trade while they hold a commission of the United States as consul. Does not he believe that they ought not to be able to go into competition with their fellows?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If gentlemen will go to one or two localities in Europe that I can indicate, they will very promptly agree with the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HITT. But in the cases that would be covered by the paragraphs sought to be stricken out, the offices deprived of salaries would fall back to fees, amounting in some cases to only about $250 or $300 a year. In such cases it would be impossible to get Americans to go there, and the only thing we can do is to try to get some capable man, even a foreigner, to accept the position. The complaint of the gentleman from Ohio that these foreigners do not sympathize with American interests and American institutions is simply a complaint against human nature and international feeling all around the world. You can not expect a Frenchman or German to sympathize with our interests or our industries as against those of his own country. Where it is deemed necessary to be represented in this way, we take the best instruments we can get. What more can the Department do?

Mr. FOOTE. Are these positions now filled by Americans?

Mr. HITT. Some of them are.

Mr. PEARSON. Ten are filled by foreigners and three by Americans.

Mr. HITT. When an American does take one of these places, he is nearly always some American who is already residing and doing business in the place.

Mr. FOOTE. Do they receive now only a thousand dollars a year and no fees?

Mr. HITT. They get the notarial fees, and they are allowed to continue in private business. They are nearly always merchants.

Mr. QUIGG. Would the evil of which the gentleman from North Carolina complains be cured by striking out this section?

Mr. HITT. Not at all.

Mr. QUIGG. So far as that is concerned, they could go on competing with Americans, could they not?

Mr. HITT. They could.

Mr. QUIGG. I do not agree with some gentlemen as to the magnitude of the evil, but in any case I do not see how it is to be cured by this amendment.

Mr. HITT. The evil I admit. It is unquestionable.

Mr. QUIGG. But how would it be cured by striking out this section?

Mr. PEARSON. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this amendment would simply prevent the degradation of the name of an American consul. We should no longer have an American consul, so called, trading in his own interest and against the interests of the country he represents. Our representative would be a consular agent, subject to the supervision of the nearest consul. There are 212 consuls on our roll. Great Britain has only 145, and France has less than 100. We can easily afford to strike down these 13, 10 of whom are foreigners and the others unable to support themselves.

The formal amendment was withdrawn.

The amendment of Mr. PEARSON was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beirut, $430.
Ciudad Porfirio Diaz, $940.
Paso del Norte, $940.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at that point.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 23, line 12, strike out "Paso del Norte" and insert "Ciudad Juarez."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RELIEF AND PROTECTION OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, and shipwrecked American seamen in the Territory of Alaska, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $50,000.

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Mrs. Harriet D. Newson, widow of Thomas M. Newson, late United States consul at Malaga, a sum of money equal to one year's salary of said consul, together with the sum of $197, which was collected from the estate of the said Thomas Newson by the Government of the United States after his death.

SEC. 2. That the money so appropriated shall be paid in the same manner as in other cases where the surviving widows of foreign representatives of the United States who have died while so representing the United States.

Mr. HITT. Is that offered as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. KIEFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITT. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. KIEFER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have in my hands a bill that has passed the Senate, with the accompanying report, and I ask to have the report read in order to show the merits of this amendment.

Mr. HITT. But on the face of it the amendment is obviously out of order. I make the point of order that it is entirely new legislation and does not belong in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HITT. I will say to the gentleman that his amendment would more properly appear in the deficiency bill. This bill, if he will read the title, is to provide for the consular and diplomatic service of the United States "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898," and of course the item in his amendment does not come within that period.

Mr. KIEFER. Will the gentleman kindly inform me how it is possible for this widow, who is very much in need, to procure the amount that seems to be due to her?

Mr. HITT. If it is a sum that could be paid out of the fund of $5,000 provided in this bill under section 1749, Revised Statutes, which would give pay for the time of transit home, it could be settled at the State Department. If not, and if it is a claim for a larger sum, it ought to come up here as a claim and be considered and passed upon, as has often been done in such cases. But if it is to be offered as an amendment to an appropriation bill, it would more properly go in the deficiency bill.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, the following being the last paragraph read:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

Commercial Bureau of American Republics, $28,000: Provided, That any moneys received from sale of the Bureau publications, from rents, or other sources shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the Secretary of State for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Bureau.

Mr. HITT. I ask unanimous consent that we go back for the purpose of correcting a footing in line 5, page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, for which he asks unanimous consent, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 13, strike out "seven" and insert "five;" so as to read "$425,000."

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITT. I wish also to correct the footing at the end of the bill. The figures now printed, "$1,676,908.76," should read "$1,673,708.76."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Before that request is acted upon, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph last read—the closing paragraph of the bill. That paragraph referring to the International Bureau of American Republics appropriates $28,000 in addition to the money received from the sale of the publications of the Bureau. I wish to ask whether that is the intention—to give this Bureau an appropriation of $28,000 and also the proceeds of the sales of all their publications?

Mr. HITT. It is. The five directors who control this Bureau are the representative of the United States (who is the president) and the ministers from Brazil, Argentina, and two other Republics. We pay in the first instance the whole expense of the Bureau out of this $28,000. The expense is then apportioned to the different countries on the basis of population, in accordance with an international agreement made years ago. In this way $12,000 is handed back to us, so that, in fact, we pay only $16,000. If, in addition, the Bureau receives any money from the sale of its publications or from the rents of a part of its building (there was a small income received from that source at one time, but I think there is none now) these additional items help to support and enlarge the Bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. As I understand, this Bureau is self-sustaining.

Mr. HITT. The money received from the sale of publications contributes toward sustaining it, but would not be sufficient to sustain it alone. The income from that source is increasing.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Did not the Bureau a year or two ago inform the committee that if we would give this appropriation of $28,000 no further appropriation would be asked, upon the ground that the Bureau had become self-sustaining?

Mr. HITT. No; they asked to have the law modified so that they might engage in the business of publishing and selling bulletins and books. We gave them that privilege two years ago, but it was not intended that the Bureau should be turned into a purely money-making institution.

These different Governments wished to contribute to the support of the Bureau, and they expected us also to contribute, according to the agreement. The directors wanted to develop the work of the Bureau, so that it might, by some means, aid in paying its own way. So provision was made for selling these bulletins, which have yielded considerable revenue, and also for subletting so much of the premises as they did not require. These things tended to help the Bureau in partly sustaining itself and making it stronger, the directors of the Bureau, the representatives of these different countries, being desirous of extending its scope and work.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The language in this bill to which I call the gentleman's particular attention is the following:

That any moneys received from sale of the Bureau publications, from rents, or other sources shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit in addition to the appropriation—

Observe the language, "in addition to the appropriation"— and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the Secretary of State for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Bureau.

So that, as I understand, the money received from the sale of the publications of the Bureau can be drawn out and used for the purposes of the Bureau, in addition to the $28,000 appropriated.

Mr. HITT. That is what is intended. We did not expect to get more than $28,000 from the different Governments altogether; but the directors of the Bureau wished to enlarge its work, which would usefully employ a larger revenue.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What will be the amount of money derived from other sources than the appropriation?

Mr. HITT. I think it would run from $5,000 to $8,000, as heretofore. This year I believe it is somewhat larger. That money is employed at once and returned to the Bureau for the purpose of collecting and sending out information and enlarging the sphere of usefulness of the Bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How are the salaries paid?

Mr. HITT. Out of the $28,000 appropriated by the Government.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What are they? Who knows what they are?

Mr. HITT. Here is the printed report of the directors, covering all of the particulars to which the gentleman refers. Anyone desiring the information can obtain it without difficulty by examining the report. The largest single item of expenditure is, of course, the pay of the directors, clerks, translators, and employees, all the way through. Then the printing bill is large; and the postage bill is considerable, because of the fact that they are not allowed the use of a frank. They must pay postage on all matter.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Are they not willing to make it independent or self-sustaining, without reliance upon the Government for support? I understand that once or twice they have made a suggestion to that effect.

Mr. HITT. Oh, there have been some theorists in connection with the matter who have made that suggestion, but it did not materialize.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow a suggestion.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. That can not be done by the action of our Government alone. This Bureau of American Republics, I will state to the gentleman, is the offspring of the Pan-American Congress, and under an agreement then made, which was ratified by the various countries south of us, each one of these Republics pays so much per annum for the support of the Bureau of American Republics, and as the United States is one party, we can not now take separate action. It would not be acting properly or in harmony with our own agreement to undertake to abolish it at this time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It seems that this is a very doubtful way of making an appropriation for such a purpose, and one that we ought not to commit ourselves to.

Mr. HITT. I would state to the gentleman that this is done pursuant to a treaty or agreement with the other powers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, proposing to reduce the footing of the bill, refers to two lines at the end of the bill which do not seem to be a part of it, but only an appended note.

Mr. HITT. There is usually permission given to correct the footings to correspond with the amendments made by the House.

I will withdraw the motion, and move that the committee now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10134, had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, and as so amended recommend that it do pass.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the adoption of the amendments in a single vote, because I do not think a separate vote is required on any of them.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House a House resolution with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations or public spaces in city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1897, etc.

The Senate amendments were read at length.

Mr. BLUE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLUE. How does this come up now?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is impossible to hear what is going on, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks how this bill comes up now. The Chair was about to reply that it is business on the Speaker's table from the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is this a House bill with Senate amendments?

The SPEAKER. A House bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. May I ask if it has been considered by the District Committee? I refer to the amendments.

The SPEAKER. They have not been considered, as far as the Chair is aware.

Mr. RICHARDSON It is now laid before the House for the action of the House on the amendments?

The SPEAKER. For the action of the House. It can be referred to the committee if desired.

Mr. PITNEY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. GROUT, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10167) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

Pending the motion,

Mr. McMILLIN said: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Were points of order reserved on the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks they were.

Mr. PITNEY. They were reserved.

Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair,

Mr. GROUT said: Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, in submitting this bill, I will occupy but a very little of the time of the House, and that only for the purpose of giving a summary of the amounts appropriated, with some reference to the purposes for which those amounts are appropriated, and also of the limitations in the bill.

The estimates for the fiscal year 1898, exclusive of the water department and of the highway act, were $8,495,787.38. This bill carries for these purposes, that is, the general purposes of the District government, $5,642,856.93, which is $2,852,930.45 less than the amount estimated. One-half of this sum is to come out of the public revenues and one-half out of the District revenues.

There is also an appropriation of $16,000 in the bill—which is $10,000 more than was asked by the Commissioners, the $10,000 being given for the cost of advertising and certain court expenses to be incurred in carrying out the permanent-highway act—which is to be paid wholly out of the District revenues, according to the provisions of that act. There is also an appropriation in the bill of $137,954.13 for the water department, which comes wholly out of the water revenues.

There was estimated for the water department $190,829.90. The amount recommended in this bill is accordingly $55,540.29 less than the sum estimated.

In this connection, I will say that the sum of $104,738.24 is appropriated out of these water revenues for the liquidation of the last installment of the debt created by the Lydecker tunnel (so called). This completely extinguishes that debt and leaves Congress free to consider anew the question whether it will take up the work of completing that tunnel, or whether it will take some other means of supplying the District with an adequate quantity of water. It is unquestionably a necessity in the District at the present time, and had the proposed work on the Lydecker scheme or any other scheme been submitted in the estimates, it would have been considered by the committee; but it was not so submitted, and for the time being the committee thought best to turn that matter aside, although they are conscious that it is a matter that can not be long delayed. It must have early attention at the hands of Congress.

Mr. McMILLIN. Right there, if the gentleman will allow me, I will suggest that I think we ought to proceed with great care in the adoption of that tunnel. When it was originally under construction there was a charge of neglect of proper precautions and fraud in its construction, and a joint committee of the Senate and House were authorized to investigate and report. Upon a thorough investigation we found that tunnel in very bad condition, in such condition that it was cheaper and better to put in the pipes that were necessary to give the then desired supply of water than it was to undertake to complete the tunnel. Any committee that will have the water pumped out of that tunnel, and will go through it, will find that it is very questionable whether the Government ought ever to complete it.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman must have understood that no appropriation was proposed in this bill on that subject.

Mr. McMILLIN. I so understood, and I only made the remark to go with the comment made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] concerning the matter.

Mr. GROUT. This matter was thought not to be sufficiently ripe to be dealt with now; but I feel justified in saying that Congress will neglect its duty to this city if it fails at some early day to make further provision for a fuller water supply, especially to the higher places in the District.

Since the failure of the Lydecker tunnel scheme there has been appropriated the sum of $470,059.87 toward what has been known as the high-service water system in this District, a system by which water was to be forced by means of engines to a higher level than it would flow to by gravity or from the pressure from the reservoir. That was estimated to cost about $600,000. There is an indefinite appropriation in this bill out of the water revenues, such as remain after the debt of the Lydecker tunnel is liquidated, to apply further upon this service, which is still in progress, but which when completed will not adequately supply the city with water, for the reason that a sufficient quantity can not now come in the entry mains from the reservoir above Georgetown for a full supply of the city. But, as I say, this whole matter is deferred until some other time.

The total estimates for this bill are $8,686,616.38. The total of this bill for all purposes is $5,780,811.06, leaving the bill $2,905,805.32 less than the estimates.

The last District bill, Mr. Chairman, carried $5,900,319.48. It was the largest bill ever passed for the expenses of the District of Columbia by quite a margin. The exact figures I have now forgotten. It was far less in amount than many thought it ought to be, and especially than many residents of the city of Washington thought it ought to be. That, however, I need not comment upon. The committee then did the best they could as to the amount, and they have done the best they can now in their attempt to carve out of the revenues of the District and the general revenues a sufficient sum for the current demands of the District of Columbia.

The committee would have been glad to have made some of the allowances larger, but could not see their way clear to do so. There are certain departments which the committee felt that they must not neglect, and especially schools, sewers, and streets—the sewers to make ready for the greater water supply that will be provided later to carry off the waste and débris of the city, thus preserving the public health; the schools, that we may not be behind in providing instruction for the young.

We have provided for two new schoolhouses in this bill, completely new, and for completing two others contracted for under authority given in the last bill. We have submitted in this bill for the action of the House $30,000 for rebuilding and enlarging the Industrial Home School. Gentlemen will remember it was provided in the last appropriation bill that this school should surrender its corporate rights before receiving any part of the appropriation in that bill. Since then the corporation has transferred entirely and completely all its corporate rights to the Government. The school was all the time on Government ground and occupying Government buildings, viz, the old almshouse of Georgetown. Nevertheless, it was a private corporation, and as such managed its own affairs in its own way. This is now wholly a public institution. It is housed in the building known as the old almshouse in Georgetown, built over one hundred years ago and now in a dilapidated, run-down condition, with much of the plaster fallen off, and leaking badly, with the windows loose and the floors badly worn; besides it has not sufficient room to accommodate anything like the whole number of homeless boys and girls in the District. Accordingly, an appropriation of $30,000 is made now for rebuilding this home, and it will just about double the capacity of the school.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the enlargement of this school, just a word as to what the future policy of Congress ought to be toward this children's home, which seeks more particularly to give its inmates an industrial education—an education, of course, in a literary sense to some extent, but principally an industrial education—just what young men and women need to fit them for the battle of life. When this school is completed for the accommodation of all that class in the District, it will relieve the subsidized institutions which now care for them, and they are three in number.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman yield to me? I ask for a minute or two of his time.

Mr. GROUT. I prefer not to yield for remarks.

Mr. MORSE. I want to ask a question, and then, Mr. Chairman, in the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, that we passed last year, on page 21, a paragraph declared the policy of the Government hereafter——

Mr. GROUT. Oh, yes; I know about that. Now, if the gentleman will suspend for a moment, I can not go into that subject now. I will come to that after a little, and I will then give the gentleman a chance for any question he chooses to ask, and give him also any time he may want for debate.

Mr. MORSE. I thought that while the gentleman was on the subject of charities that was pertinent. It is an inquiry as to the attitude of this bill toward those charities.

Mr. GROUT. I assure the gentleman I will speak of that when I come to the subject of "charities." I have the word "charities" written on my slip here and will not fail to speak of that subject and explain how the bill leaves those institutions before I close.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman allow this provision of last year to be read from the Clerk's desk, in order that it may accompany his remarks and make them more comprehensive?

Mr. GROUT. I say, when we reach that subject I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

What I want to say, Mr. Chairman, is that this Industrial Home School, if developed and enlarged as it can be and as it ought to be, will provide for the children now provided for in three private and sectarian institutions that have heretofore received appropriations from the Government in the District. That is St. John's Parish School, an Episcopal institution; St. Rose Industrial School, a Catholic institution for girls, and St. Joseph Industrial School, another Catholic institution for boys. Speaking my own individual sentiments, I will say I would make this appropriation double the amount, to be expended at once for the enlargement of this school beyond what the $30,000 will accomplish; but that is the amount the bill recommends, and it is all I am commissioned by the committee to present.

Now, as to the sewers, there is an appropriation of $875,000 in cash, and a contract authorizing $835,000 more, which you will see makes about three-quarters of a million dollars for sewers.

The bill carries an appropriation of $110,000 for a site for a hospital for contagious diseases, of which the city stands so much in need. We have also provided for one new fire engine, in addition to those now in use in the District. The last bill also carried a provision for a fire engine, making two provided for by the present Congress.

Now, with reference to the charities to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] has referred, it will be seen by turning to page 37 of the bill that the committee has appropriated a lump sum for charitable work which is equal to the exact amount given to the subsidized institutions last year, and have put the expenditure of this money under the control of the District Commissioners. The point which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] desires to call attention to in the law enacted last year was considered by the committee, and it was thought by the majority that this expenditure would have to be made in accordance with that law, and the committee have reported the bill in this form with the professed understanding on their part that the money is to be expended in accordance with the provision of the bill of last year which the gentleman from Massachusetts asks to have read, and for the reading of which I will now yield to him.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk and ask to have read the provision in the bill of last year on this subject, in order that it may be incorporated in the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Government of the United States to make no appropriation of money or property for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding by payment for services, expenses, or otherwise any church or religious denomination, or any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control; and it is hereby enacted that, from and after the 30th day of June, 1897, no money appropriated for charitable purposes in the District of Columbia, shall be paid to any church or religious denomination, or to any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

Mr. MORSE. Now, Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman from Vermont to say that that provision in the law of last year applies to the expenditure of the money carried in this bill under the head of "charities"?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I certainly understand that provision to be permanent law. I think there is no question about that. I have stated that the majority of the committee thought that provision would control the expenditure of this money and that there could be no fair question about that. I did not, however, say that I thought this latter proposition was entirely beyond question. What view the Commissioners might take of it no one can be sure. This question has arisen in the mind of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and may suggest itself to others. The committee, however—a majority of them—thought that this provision would control this expenditure.

Mr. MORSE. Then would the gentleman object to such an amendment as would make that point very clear?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, that is a fair question, and to it I shall have to say in reply that personally I would not object to such an amendment; and since the gentleman brings this point before the Committee of the Whole, I feel at liberty to state, in fact feel compelled to state, that I did not myself concur with the majority in the opinion that it was so entirely beyond question that a reference to the enactment in the last appropriation, as controlling the expenditure, would not be wise and prudent; although I did not hesitate to say that it should control, and that if the question were adjudicated by the courts in all probability it would be held to control. I thought, however, that in order to make the matter perfectly plain, there ought to be a reference in this bill to the enactment in the last bill; and I made an express reservation in the committee of the right to favor an amendment to that effect if one should be offered. But I want to say here that I have not stated till now that fact to anyone outside the committee, not to any living soul; but I did say in the committee that if such an amendment were offered here, I should not object to it, but must be left free to favor it.

Mr. MORSE. I think, Mr. Chairman, that at the proper time we will see that such an amendment is offered, so as to make the matter very clear. I concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Vermont that the provision in the bill of last year has all the binding force and effect of law, and that the Commissioners would be guilty of an outrage if they should disregard the expressed will of Congress in that respect. We fought that battle out here last year after days of controversy, and it should be regarded as settled.

Mr. GROUT. When the bill is open for amendment, of course there will be opportunity to present any proper amendments.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont whether the provision to which he has referred is contained in the appropriation bill of last year?

Mr. GROUT. It is.

Mr. RAY. Then how could it have any force and effect in the case of a new appropriation made in a bill passed this year?

Mr. GROUT. There is the chance for a question about the matter, but the act of last year contains the language, "It is hereby enacted," and so has the distinctive language of permanent law.

Mr. MORSE. Declared to be the policy of the Government.

Mr. GROUT. The language is, "It is hereby enacted" that no money appropriated for charities shall be paid to institutions of a certain class after a certain time, and it was thought by the majority of the committee that that placed the matter beyond question.

Mr. RAY. I do not think there can be any question about it at all. The provision being simply contained in the appropriation bill which was enacted for one year, applied simply to the use of the money appropriated by that bill, and could have no force or effect in controlling the use of money appropriated by a new bill not containing such a provision.

Mr. CANNON. That is an extraordinary statement for the best lawyer on the Judiciary Committee to make, that there can be no legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. RAY. I have not said that. I thank the gentleman for his compliment, but I made no such claim. I do say that when we put a clause into an appropriation bill appropriating money for a single year, it would be held by any court in Christendom to apply only to the use of that particular money.

Mr. PITNEY. Unless it says otherwise.

Mr. RAY. Unless it said otherwise.

Mr. PITNEY. And it does say otherwise.

Mr. RAY. It would be construed, I say, by any court not to be a permanent law, but to apply simply to the use of the money appropriated in that bill, and I do not think the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would claim the contrary.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, in order to save time, I wish to suggest that I am sure the debate on this question would not proceed further on the point made by the gentleman from New York if he would read the provision of the statute, because he is a good lawyer and he certainly would not maintain any such ground.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been injected into the general explanation of the bill in such a way as perhaps to unsettle the minds of some members in regard to the force and effect of the provision which has been referred to. I apprehend it is a well-known fact that a provision may go upon an appropriation bill and may become permanent law, and that is just this case. It enacts and makes permanent law what the settled policy of this Government shall hereafter be upon this subject of charities in the District of Columbia.

If the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] had read the provisions carefully, he would not have made the statement he has made. It may as well be said at this point that to put the provision again into the appropriation bill would be simply to adopt the illogical assumption that what has become permanent law must be reenacted from year to year in order to make plain what the intention of the lawmaking power is. I apprehend that no well-informed and efficient lawyer would make any such suggestion. There is no more necessity for reenacting this provision on the present appropriation bill than for reenacting any other part of the permanent law of the United States.

It has been intimated that the omission of this provision might be construed as an implied repeal. But courts do not favor repeals by implication. It would be a violation of the rules for interpreting statutes to hold that the omission of this provision after it has become permanent law would repeal it.

The rule that we have here is a very pointed and well-defined one—that there shall not be placed upon an appropriation bill any provision which changes existing law. Under that rule, if properly and rigidly enforced, no such provision as this could have been put on the District appropriation bill. But it seems this provision was put on the bill in conference; and when it came here from a conference committee no point of order could be taken against it. In this way it became permanent law, and there is absolutely no necessity for reenacting it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] that this debate be deferred——

Mr. RAY rose.

Mr. GROUT. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention when I rose to excite any particular debate. My object was only that we might have a fair understanding on this subject. The gentleman from Illinois did me the courtesy to suggest that I know a little something about the law. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] does me the still higher courtesy of suggesting that I do not know anything. [Laughter.] And I presume he knows all about it. He says and says that no well-informed lawyer would make such a suggestion as I made.

Mr. Chairman, in the simple suggestion that I desired to make my object was that no gentleman on the floor of the House should be misled. Of course it is quite possible for us to put into an appropriation bill—and sometimes we do so—something that becomes, by force of the language used, permanent law; and then it is binding until repealed. Again, the language put into an appropriation bill and the connection of that language may show that the provision applies simply and only to the appropriations then and there made.

Now, the mere fact in the present case that the committee saw fit to object to putting the language used last year in the present bill shows that some of them at least believe that it is best to omit it and leave this an open question for the construction of the courts hereafter. If this House is in favor of having this provision in the law, why not say so by an amendment that will make it absolutely certain.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman has misunderstood the position of the committee; but I will pass that point for the moment. The question being whether a given provision in an appropriation bill is or is not a part of the permanent law, and supposing that the language in question is not to take effect until after the expiration of the year for which the appropriations are made, has the gentleman any doubt whether such a provision is permanent law? The fact is that this is a provision which is not to take effect until the 1st of July, 1897. Therefore it can not by any stretch of construction be construed as limited to the appropriations in the bill containing the provision.

Mr. RAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is mere assertion.

Mr. PITNEY. That is the language of the law.

Mr. RAY. Oh, no; the gentleman has not recited any law nor has he recited the language of any law. He has merely recited what he believes to be a proper construction or interpretation of the law.

Mr. PITNEY. I am reciting the exact language of the provision in question, that it takes effect the 1st day of July, 1897.

Mr. RAY. So far as that goes, the gentleman may be correct that the provision is to take effect at a given time. But that does not bind or conclude this Congress, and it does not have any force in the interpretation of the law. When we come to an appropriation bill we must take the language contained in it, and when we undertake to say whether or not it is affected by the appropriation bill of last year we must take that law as it reads; and if that law is fairly open to the construction that it is intended as an independent enactment, and is not to apply solely and alone to the appropriation as then made, then it would be a permanent enactment.

Mr. PITNEY. The provision was not intended to be limited to that appropriation bill at all.

Mr. RAY. There is the question.

Mr. PITNEY. There is no question about it. Let the gentleman read the language of the act.

Mr. RAY. I do not care to open now the discussion of this question, and I will not. I did not rise for any such purpose. It would divert the gentleman having charge of this bill from the proper and orderly consideration of the bill. I simply rose to make a suggestion in order that this matter might come up at a future time in the debate. But I desire now to say, Mr. Chairman, that my only purpose was to call attention to this feature, and to suggest that this matter be dropped until we reach that portion of the bill where the consideration of the question will necessarily arise under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman from New York has concluded, I will call his attention to the provision of the law of last year, and I think he will see that it has all the characteristics and peculiarities of a permanent law. This is the language of the provision that was embodied in the appropriation bill of last year:

> And it is hereby declared that it is the policy of the Government of the United States to make no appropriation of money or property for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, of any church, religious denominations, or any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control—> and it is hereby enacted that on and after the 30th day of June, 1897, no money appropriated for charitable purposes in the District of Columbia shall be paid to any church or religious denominations, or to any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

So I think the gentleman from New York will see that the language is a little more specific than he supposed. It has the essential earmarks of a permanent enactment. It was not a mere limitation upon the appropriation made in that particular bill, but it is a provision that applies to the policy to be pursued by the Government in reference to these matters hereafter, and refers to future appropriations, and not to the one then made.

Nevertheless, sir, we are considering an appropriation bill now, and what that may mean when it becomes a law is an entirely different question. It is a question by itself whether it may not so modify this provision—for the two must be read together—that those who are called upon to administer the law may be in doubt about it.

I will say in reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] that no one in the committee proposed, nor is it suggested here, to reenact the provision in the appropriation bill of last year, but only to refer to it in this act as the law under which the disbursement of this money for charities is to be made.

That is all I have heard proposed by anyone; and it can certainly do no harm, and it will make certain what all would accomplish, namely, not to repeal or annul, but to keep on the statute book the enactment in the last bill and observe its provisions.

But, Mr. Chairman, that will be a proper matter to be discussed when the bill is read for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule, and when this particular provision is reached. It is, however, it seems to me, proper to discuss that matter now in general debate, if any gentleman desires to do so, and so far as I am concerned I do not propose to cut off such debate.

Now, as to further general debate, I will say that my colleague on the committee from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], a member of the subcommittee, desires to be heard, and unless there is some proposition to limit the debate, we will let it run for the present at the pleasure of the committee.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Before the gentleman from New Jersey proceeds, will he permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will be much obliged if the gentleman in the course of his remarks will call attention to and explain the reason why the committee have cut down the appropriation for the public schools.

Mr. PITNEY. I will say to the gentleman from California that I prefer any inquiries of that character should be deferred until we reach the provisions of the bill in its consideration, or the gentleman may take the floor in his own right for the general debate hereafter. I shall address myself to a different part of the bill.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman from New Jersey will permit me, I will say to the inquiry of the gentleman from California that the amount appropriated for schools is not cut down, but is actually larger than it was last year. The estimates submitted by the Commissioners have been reduced by the bill, but that is not the standard. The Commissioners estimate what they want, and if we were to follow their estimates implicitly, as the gentleman's question implies that we should, this bill would carry nearly three millions of dollars more than it does now; in fact, would carry more than the revenues of the District would meet for the year 1898. It would have carried an appropriation that would have frightened you all, and frightened the Commissioners, too. The Commissioners do not fail to ask enough, and they get what in the judgment of Congress ought to be given.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] and others interested in this bill the propriety of deferring by agreement the general debate in respect to charities until we reach the paragraph relating to that subject. It seems to me we can have a more orderly, effective, and intelligent discussion by pursuing that policy which has frequently been pursued—deferring the discussion of this paragraph until we reach it in the bill.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, since that suggestion is made, I ask unanimous consent that general debate concerning the paragraph relating to charities be deferred until we reach that paragraph in reading the bill. Will the gentleman fix the time now, or leave it to be fixed then?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think that could be very well left open.

Mr. MORSE. Would it be under the five-minute rule?

Mr. GROUT. No; general debate. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we ought now to agree on some time that should then be devoted to general debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I would suggest not to exceed an hour on a side.

Mr. GROUT. I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think thirty minutes on a side will be plenty. We spent a great deal of time on this subject in the last session, and I think we are pretty well posted on it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am willing, as far as I am concerned. We should still have an opportunity for debate under the five-minute rule after general debate is concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GROUT. Unless some gentleman wants more time, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this paragraph be deferred until it is reached in the reading of the bill, and that then it be limited to thirty minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that general debate on the paragraph relating to charities be postponed until that paragraph is reached in the reading of the bill, and that the general debate shall then be limited to thirty minutes on a side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, the remarks which I shall submit to the committee at this time will be in the line of a justification and vindication—I will not say defense—of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia with regard to their action in providing for the electric-lighting service of this District for the current fiscal year.

Gentlemen of the committee will remember that when the District appropriation bill was reported to the House a year ago, statements were made in general debate concerning the investigations of the subcommittee having charge of the making up of the bill relative to the cost of the electric-lighting service and what that cost ought to be, and gentlemen will remember that the Committee on Appropriations reported a provision requiring expressly that the Commissioners of the District should let the electric lighting to competition, and providing that subway privileges should be given to the successful competitor. That last provision was struck out on a point of order, and other provisions were subsequently put in as the result of a conference between committees of the Senate and of the House, and finally the perfected bill passed both Houses in the form in which it now stands upon the statute book. It is doubtless also within the knowledge of members of the House that the Commissioners of the District, under the terms of that appropriation act, advertised for proposals for the electric-lighting service of the District; that in response to those advertisements they received proposals; that they let a contract to a new company, a competitor of the old established company; that litigation has ensued since that time; that that litigation has been decided in favor of the action taken by the Commissioners, and that they have thereupon proceeded to make a contract and to give permits for the construction of underground conduits to contain electric wires to serve the purposes of the public electric lighting.

Since the excavations were commenced for these underground conduits, the newspapers have at frequent intervals contained sensational reports, criticising the action of the Commissioners and denouncing them in unmeasured terms, and suggestions have been made that the President ought to remove them and that Congress ought to impeach them. They have been charged with violations of the law; they have been charged with a wanton exercise of the discretion reposed in them by law, and have been charged with almost everything except the performance of their duty.

Now, my position as one of the subcommittee which had charge of these investigations has given me certain information on the points involved, and has given me some knowledge of the law, which does not seem to be possessed by the representatives of the newspapers, or by some members of Congress who have submitted to be interviewed for the newspapers. I therefore desire to take some time in explaining what the Commissioners have done and why they have done it, and to say that in my opinion, instead of being properly subject to adverse criticism, they are entitled to the praise of Congress and of the people of this District for carrying out their plain duty under the law and for using the powers reposed in them to introduce competition into the electric-lighting service of this District, from motives of economy and from motives which tend to the public welfare.

Gentlemen will remember that at the time the appropriation bill was reported last year attention was called to the fact that under laws already existing, and under the appropriation bill as we reported it, it was unlawful to light the public electric lights of the city by means of overhead wires. The language of the appropriation bill then reported and of all appropriation bills during a series of years was that the public lighting should be done by means of underground wires, and at the same time the gross amount allowed in that appropriation bill, as first reported and as afterwards enacted into law, and the prices limited for payment for each electric light showed that it was the intention of Congress to authorize and direct the Commissioners to extend the public electric-lighting service.

It became necessary for them to provide for additional electric lights not theretofore allowed, and under the law it was necessary for them to light them by means of underground wires. Gentlemen may also remember that in the sundry civil appropriation act for the current fiscal year a provision was made for the lighting of some public parks in this city not previously lighted by electricity, and it was provided that it should be done by means of underground wires; and it was known——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does the gentleman care to be interrupted now?

Mr. PITNEY. Not unless the gentleman is afraid he will forget the point he desires to inquire about; but I will yield, provided the gentleman does not take up too much of my time.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I propose to ask the gentleman in what part of the law that provides for an extension of electric lighting as distinguished from gas light is that particular appropriation carried? It provided for the diminution of the price of both gas and electric lights, but it did not provide for an extension of electric lighting as distinguished from gas lighting. Did it?

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman is quite in error. I will call his attention to the language in a moment. I will premise that in the annual appropriation bills for this District for several years this language was contained, in respect to electric arc lighting, viz, for "maintaining existing service and necessary extensions of such service;" and that language, "existing service," taken in connection with the other language and other provisions of the law, was held by the then existing electric light company as supporting its claim to a monopoly of the public and private lighting in this city. Therefore, one year ago, in making up this bill, your Committee on Appropriations, desiring to do away with the existing monopoly and introduce competition into the service of electric lighting, changed the language of the appropriation bill. As gentlemen will remember, in general debate on the appropriation bill, I called attention to that change in the language. We left out the words "for maintaining existing service," and put into the bill this language:

For electric arc lighting, including necessary inspection, in those streets now lighted with electric arc lights in the city of Washington, and for necessary extensions of such service, $43,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then, if the gentleman pleases, it was simply left to the judgment of the Commissioners, as you will maintain, I presume, as to the ratio to be lighted by electric light or by gas. Is that the gentleman's contention?

Mr. PITNEY. Not at all. The bill also contained a provision appropriating a certain amount of money for gas and other illuminating material, and the presumption was that the Commissioners were to expend it all. They did recommend a much larger amount, and we gave them only a part of their recommendation. It was submitted by them that the public service required such and such extensions. We cut down the appropriation below the amount they recommended, but we still increased the appropriation above what previous laws had given. It was saying that Congress gave so much of their recommendation and a plain direction to the Commissioners that they should proceed to expend that much money in lighting the city, should use so much in gas lighting and other material and so much in electric arc lighting. In addition to giving the appropriation of $50,000 for electric arc lights and for necessary extensions, Congress limited the amount to be paid to 30 cents each per night for electric arc lights.

Now, what was done in the appropriations previous to that time? The appropriation for the fiscal year which expired on the 30th of June, 1896, for electric arc lighting was $47,600, and the limit permitted for each lamp per night was 40 cents; and with that appropriation the Commissioners had maintained 338 arc lights at 37.42 cents per night, amounting to about $136.50 per year, which for the 338 lights amounted to $46,164; and the little overplus of about $1,400 or $1,500 was used by the Commissioners for the inspection and maintenance of the lights. Then Congress at its last session appropriated $50,000 for the fiscal year 1897, and limited the price to 30 cents per night, which makes $109.50 per year for each lamp, so that the appropriation at that price would pay for 456 lights, an increase of 118 lights, or more than one-third of the whole service over and above the lights theretofore maintained. Now, the Commissioners advertised for proposals, and they were able to increase the service even more than the limit price would do, because they knew before they advertised, and they were well assured when the proposals came in, that the limit price would not be reached, that they could get proposals at a lower price, and so they did, and they managed to make contracts for 472 electric-light arc lamps instead of 378, an increase of 134.

Further, the Commissioners of the District, when they appeared before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations a year ago with their recommendations for the lighting service for the fiscal year 1897, laid before the subcommittee a schedule of the streets they proposed to light with the increased appropriation. That schedule may be found by any gentleman who will refer to page 177 of the hearings of last year. It showed that the Commissioners desired to light the rapid-transit electric lines on which the cars are now traveling at a very high rate of speed, and on which they will hereafter travel, I presume, at the rate of 12 miles an hour. The Commissioners specified the streets and parts of streets they desired to light, and we allowed them sufficient money to provide for a part of that schedule, but not the whole of it. The Commissioners, using the money that we did allow them, advertised for the very same streets and parts of streets that were named in the schedule they had submitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is no new thing for the Commissioners to advertise for proposals for electric lighting or gas lighting. They have been doing it for years, inviting competitors to come into this field and relieve the people of this District and the Government from paying exorbitant rates for the service. They had not only been doing that, but they had been required by three separate acts of Congress to do it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow a question there?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the Commissioners were required in that manner to advertise, as the law now provides that there shall not be more than so much paid for the service, why could they not have just as well gone on with the old company as, by their direct action, to raise a new company to cut up streets where the conduits of the old company were already laid?

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman has asked me three or four questions at once, but I want to answer them all, and if I do not, I ask him to call my attention to the fact. The Commissioners are required, under the organic act of the District, to advertise for proposals for any public work costing more than $1,000, and they have done so for years without any more express provision of law; and the judge of the supreme court of the District, who has recently decided this electric-lighting litigation, has held that that provision bound them to advertise for this very service now in question. But, more than that, in the appropriation bills for the years 1890, 1891, and 1894—the intervening period between 1891 and 1894 having been covered by a three-years contract, so that advertisement would have been absurd, there being no new contracts to be made—in the three years I have named the appropriation bills specifically required the Commissioners to advertise for both gas and electric lighting, and specifically declared that they were not to be limited to any one system, and in one case, that of the act for the fiscal year 1894, the law specifically declared that they were not to be limited to any one company. The Commissioners have followed regularly that very proper practice of inviting proposals. But the gentleman from New Hampshire says: "Invite proposals, but take them only from one company!"

How absurd that would be, Mr. Chairman, to invite proposals under a law that says, "You are not to be restricted to any one company or any one system," and to sweep out of the way all proposals unless they come from this dear and cherished monopoly! I will tell the gentleman, further, why the Commissioners did not accept proposals from the United States Electric Lighting Company, which seems to be so sacred in this District. It was because that company would not submit any proposals, but wrote to the Commissioners protesting against their action, saying that they had no right to take that action, and also because that company then went into court and tried to get an injunction against the Commissioners, prohibiting them from contracting under the plain and express provision of the appropriation bill, which required that extensions of service be made according to the judgment of the Commissioners and within a limit as to cost.

But the fact is that that old company has been given the benefit of the doubt by the Commissioners instead of being unjustly discriminated against, as is claimed, for they are now supplying under a temporary arrangement a large number of lights (824) at $109.50 per lamp per year, although the new company has offered to do the same lighting at $100 per lamp per year.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman permit me a moment? I care nothing for the old company or the new company——

Mr. PITNEY. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The question here is, What is best for the city and for the people of the District of Columbia? If the line of the gentleman's argument should be carried out, would it not require all the streets to be dug up again for the benefit of some new gas company that may be formed?

Several MEMBERS. That would be a good thing.

Mr. PITNEY. That might be a very good thing, as gentlemen suggest; but I will come to that point in a moment. The cases are not parallel. Let me say to the gentleman, however, that this District has been afflicted with a gas monopoly for so long a time that I do not know when it began—some time before the war, I believe. The people who have suffered under that monopoly have tried to get rid of it. Congress, at their instance, has put in the appropriation bills, at least in the three years I have mentioned, a provision commanding the Commissioners to invite proposals to see if they could not get rid of this gas monopoly. But that gas monopoly has its pipes in every street of the city. Practically, they have already occupied the ground. Perhaps a competitor could not make any headway against them unless it had the right to occupy the same streets already occupied by the existing monopoly. But with the electric lighting of the city the case is different. This old company, so called, although it has existed in this District since 1883, although it has been favored by acts of Congress and by appropriations, although it has been in the enjoyment of a practical monopoly, though not a legal one, yet it has not exercised enterprise to a reasonable degree; it has not extended its lighting system so as to cover any material part of the District up to the present time; it has not introduced new improvements. It has not reduced the price of lighting, except under compulsion, and hardly then. The field is open. We can authorize a new company to come in and get within striking distance of the old company without unduly disturbing the sacred asphalt pavements of Washington. The fact is that the privilege granted to this new company for lighting the city of Washington east of Rock Creek does not cover one foot of the streets now lighted by the United States Company, and for which the United States Company has the subways necessary to do the lighting.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is it not true that the United States Company—if that is the old company—I do not know which is the old and which is the new, and I care less—but is it not true that the old company has conduits already laid in the streets here; that they have asked authority from the Commissioners to put their wires in those conduits, and can not get that authority?

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman is wrong; and he is very wide of the question now under discussion. I do not care to follow him in that line of remark.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I want to get at the facts.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will bring up that matter later, I will answer him so far as I have information. But the point, as suggested by the gentleman's former inquiry, is whether the Commissioners have not allowed a great lot of subways to be laid unnecessarily. I answer, absolutely not a foot. Every inch of public lighting that has been let by the District Commissioners to the new company is in streets or avenues, or parts of streets or avenues, where the United States Company has not any subways or conduits underground, nor any overhead wires. That is the truth, whatever the gentleman may think. And there is no conduit now being constructed by the new company under these permits in any streets where the United States Company has any subways, excepting only two blocks on New York avenue and two short blocks on Pennsylvania avenue along Lafayette Square, where, however, the new subway is on the opposite side of the broad avenue from the old subway, and in these places the conduits are paralleled because it is necessary that the new company should be allowed to get from its power station to its lighting territory.

Moreover, the United States Company would have been obliged to construct just as many conduits as the Potomac Company is now under permit to construct if the United States Company had been successful in its proposals—except only as to a distance of less than 2 miles necessary to reach the center of the city from the plant of the new company west of Rock Creek—a distance of 1.8 miles, according to the certificate of the Commissioners. All this cry about digging up the sacred soil, and all that sort of thing, is intended to blind the eyes of members of Congress and other persons concerned as to the real issue.

I will say further, however, to the gentleman from New Hampshire that with regard to so much of the conduits or subways now under construction by the new company as are intended for lighting the public parks, notably Lincoln Park on East Capitol street, the Commissioners had nothing in the world to do with authorizing the construction of those subways, except to carry out a duty which the court had held devolved upon them. Those parks are lighted by the Secretary of War under a provision in the sundry civil appropriation law, after the publication of an advertisement and the receipt of proposals by him from both companies. The United States Company did bid for the lighting of the parks, and in so bidding that company admitted the right of the Secretary of War to ask for bids and admitted the propriety of the competition. If the United States Company had been successful, it would have been obliged to lay a part of the same subways and of the same conduits that the Potomac Company is now laying for that service.

Moreover, there are some subways now being constructed where there are no lights to be put along the line of the subways. That is true; but they are being constructed under permits which limit them to streets and avenues which the Commissioners have recommended to Congress as streets and avenues that should be lighted because they follow the lines of the rapid-transit street railroad companies. I may say that the Commissioners recommended the electric lighting of those same avenues and streets before the Potomac Company was ever heard of; it is no new recommendation. I repeat, the subways, so far as they go where no lights are now allowed, are placed on streets and avenues upon which the Commissioners have been recommending repeatedly, since the rapid-transit lines were projected, the introduction of electric lights. So there is absolutely no unnecessary construction of conduits.

I do not pose here as the special champion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I have not been asked by them, or by anybody else, to stand here and explain this matter or champion their cause on the floor of the House. But I have seen them accused of actions of which I think they are absolutely guiltless. I have heard them accused of misconduct concerning their course in reference to these matters. I have seen them libeled and vilified for carrying out what they believed to be the plain letter of the law. And because they have no opportunity for a hearing in this presence, I propose to explain the matter according to the facts, according to the law, and according to my understanding of the needs of the case.

Let us see, then, for a moment how it was with the United States Electric Lighting Company. This old company claimed and still claims a monopoly of the electric lighting within the limits of the District of Columbia. It began to light a few streets with electric arc lamps under the provisions of the bill making appropriations for the fiscal year 1887, and by the end of that year they had a very large amount of overhead wires stretched in the city of Washington which were dangerous to life and property; and there was an outcry on the part of the people, and consequent action taken by Congress, which required the wires to be put under the ground. In the appropriation bill which passed on the 18th day of July, 1888, it was enacted that from and after the 15th day of September of that year the Commissioners should grant no further permits for overhead construction of wires. So that since then it has been unlawful for any electric-light company to stretch a foot of wire in the streets of Washington, except I think—and there may be even no exceptions—where it was necessary to reach a house from where the wires terminated in an alley. I will not be sure, however, about the exception.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Before the gentleman proceeds to the next point, I would like to ask him a question. If I understand this matter correctly, the old company, the United States Company, as the gentleman calls it, would have been required to lay its conduit to Lincoln Park, for a distance of two blocks, while the Potomac Company had to build several miles of conduit.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman is absolutely and entirely incorrect in his statement. The truth is quite otherwise.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I understand that to be a fact.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman is quite mistaken in his understanding.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I think the facts are that this company had to lay conduits for two blocks only, while the other company had to go several miles.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman does not know the facts evidently. The United States Company has no conduits within two blocks of the Lincoln Park, or anywhere near that.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. How near is the nearest part of the line to the park?

Mr. PITNEY. The nearest, I think, is at the Capitol.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Oh, no.

Mr. PITNEY. But, whether that be so or not, I am standing here to vindicate the action of the Commissioners, who had nothing whatever to do with the contract for lighting Lincoln Park. The Secretary of War made that contract, and the company having the contract applied to the Commissioners for a permit, and then another company got out an injunction against the Commissioners, restraining them from granting the permit, and after a hearing the injunction was dissolved, and the court held that it was right for the Commissioners to grant the permit.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Can the gentleman inform us whether the Secretary of War is the owner of any stock in the Potomac Company?

Mr. PITNEY. I have no acquaintance with the Secretary of War and no knowledge of his holdings. I have no stock myself in any electric-light or any other company in the District of Columbia, and, so far as my action is concerned, it is without any personal interest whatever in this regard.

Now, let us see how this monopoly grew up. I say that by the act of July 18, 1888, the Commissioners were prohibited from giving any further permit for the stringing of overhead wires. There were overhead wires already in existence at that time, and that act did not expressly require the taking of them down, and therefore the company which had already erected these wires was privileged to use them and enjoy the benefits of them for lighting purposes in the streets of the city. In the annual appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1890 the public lighting was authorized only by underground wires. This provision inured to the benefit of the United States Company. Again, by a provision in the appropriation bill for 1892, additional conduits were prohibited beyond an aggregate of 5 miles until report should be made by the subway commissioners, appointed pursuant to the act of August 6, 1890, or until April 1, 1892, if that report should not have been made by that date. This again prevented competition before and after that date, although not evidently so intended, while by the construction of the law which has been adopted, by way of giving the benefit of the doubt to the company already in the field, permits have been given to the United States Company for subways since April 1, 1892.

And that brings me to the inquiry made a moment ago by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] and which I then declined to answer, as to whether recently the United States Company have not applied to the Commissioners for underground permits and been refused.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No; that was not exactly my question. My question is whether, in conduits already laid, they have not been denied the privilege of laying their wires.

Mr. PITNEY. Absolutely no, according to my information.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. My best information is that they have.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well; I will tell you what has happened. The United States Company, while enjoying these special privileges which it had managed to get by construction of the appropriation bills, has applied repeatedly to the Commissioners of the District to put overhead wires underground, has obtained this permission, has constructed the conduits, and then has put new wires in the conduits, leaving the overhead wires where they were, and leaving them in use. Having got permits to construct subways for the avowed purpose of putting those very wires underground, it has used the subways for another purpose, in fraud of the permits granted to them by the Commissioners.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Would there be any objection to putting newer and better wires down there instead of the old wires?

Mr. PITNEY. Not if they removed the old wires; but they did not remove the overhead wires, and do not claim to have done it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The Commissioners ought to make them do it, then.

Mr. PITNEY. The representative of the United States Company appeared before our subcommittee two weeks ago and said the Commissioners did not have any right to make them take these overhead wires down.

Now, I say it is not true that the Commissioners refused any proper permit for subway construction to the United States Company until that company went into court and managed to get a decision from the court a year ago which was construed to mean that the Commissioners did not have any right to grant such permits.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman a few moments ago extolled the court when they found the other way. Now, it seems to me his language is very peculiar when he says that the company "managed" to get a decision. I do not understand such a thing as that is capable of performance in the courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PITNEY. I absolutely disclaim any intention of casting any reflection on the court.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Very well.

Mr. PITNEY. If my language admitted of such construction, I withdraw it. The fact is, that the decision to which I referred, which was announced on the 1st day of February, 1896, by Judge Bingham, proceeded on a different line from what I understood it to proceed upon. I remember very well that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] now interrogating me paraded that decision before us, not the opinion, but the fact of the decision having been made, as a conclusive answer to a contention that I was making on the floor in Committee of the Whole on that day. My contention was to the effect that Congress had the right to authorize these appropriations, and that that carried with it the incidental right to put the wires underground. The gentleman quoted the decision against me. In point of fact, the decision was on an entirely different point, and did not touch that point at all. The decision prevented them from laying down subways for private consumers. I understood it to prevent them from laying down subways for public lighting. Subsequently, and about the 1st or 10th of December, 1896, the express point having been raised, was decided by Judge Cole, of the supreme court of the District, in accordance with the contention that I made on the 1st of February of last year, which I repeated subsequently, and which I made at the commencement of my present remarks, namely, that the authorization of expenditures for extensions of electric-lighting service, which also required that those extensions should be by underground wires, carried with it the implied authority to the District Commissioners to give permits for subway construction. But the decision of February 1, 1896, was laid hold upon as the basis of a claim for monopoly, and I will say that that claim was partly based on the language that I have already referred to, contained in the annual appropriation bills for a number of years, "maintaining existing service and necessary extensions."

Your Committee on Appropriations last year struck out that language, so that we now provide service simply for those streets where the service is now maintained and the necessary extension of that service. However, all the legislation for years—that is, previous to the appropriation bill of a year ago—was such as to give a virtual though not a legal or express monopoly to this electric-light company, and if these several blind and "fragmental statutes," as they have been called, had been framed for the very purpose of perpetuating the sole control of that company in the District, while keeping Congress in the dark as to the situation and as to the purpose and effect of the laws, they could not have been better devised.

But I say again that in this year's appropriation for the maintenance of the service and the extension of the service we provided that it must be done by underground wires. The Commissioners therefore had no option but to make a contract which must carry with it the permission to build the underground conduits. The question as to whether they violated the law is, it seems to me, too plain for debate. At any rate, the question has been fully litigated in the courts and adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it has been decided that the Commissioners not only did not do a wrong thing but did their plain duty under the appropriation bill.

But the claim is often heard here, and the gentleman from New Hampshire has made it in my hearing, that the policy of Congress is not to allow competition, but to establish and maintain these monopolies, and to regulate the rates and charges of the monopolies.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am not in favor of any monopoly whatever. My contention and purpose are that the Commissioners should be required to exercise such ordinary diligence and supervision as would justify them in extending the lights, and whatever company may have the special territory under contract, it is not right that they, in pursuance of any of their discretionary powers, should go so far as to pick out one company and give it a permit to tear up the streets for miles when another company could have rendered the same service and not have disturbed the streets for more than a couple of blocks.

Mr. PITNEY. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I have already shown that the Commissioners have not exercised any discretion in the direction of increasing the subways. They have exercised their discretion in the direction of giving service to the United States Company where it was qualified to fulfill the service, and they are paying them a little more money for it. They are paying them $109.50 per lamp per year when they had an offer of $100 per lamp, and that on 324 lamps. The gentleman from New Hampshire has forgotten that the organic law of the District provides that in all matters in excess of $1,000 the Commissioners shall advertise for bids; and while it gives the Commissioners the right to reject all bids, it does not give them the right to reject one bid and take another that is higher. If they do not reject all bids, they are absolutely required to accept the lowest bid; and Judge Cole has held, and it is not disputed by the representatives of the United States Company, that that provision was binding upon the Commissioners of the District with reference to this very contract, and therefore it is not a question of giving it to this company or to that company. But so far as my personal feeling is concerned, if the Commissioners had any discretion they might better authorize the tearing up of a few blocks more of the sacred pavements of Washington, in order to break up this controlling monopoly that has been here for so many years. It has not held itself under the laws, as I will show to the gentleman later——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to say that the District Commissioners and the heads of every Executive Department of this Government have exercised their authority time and again, even where lower bids were offered, to refuse the bid of the lower bidders because they had not the proper facilities for carrying out their bids.

Mr. PITNEY. This is not a question of whether they should have rejected the lower bid. They accepted the only bid. It is not a question of taking this bid out from other bids. The Potomac Company were the only bidders. The gentleman is misinformed and does not know the simplest facts concerning the controversy. I have here a copy of a letter from the United States Electric Lighting Company to the Commissioners of the District, dated June 26, 1896, in which the company expressly declined to enter into any competition. They never made a bid for any of the District lighting, and where they now render any service it is done under a temporary arrangement and without any security being given for the faithful performance of the service.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Have they ever declined to furnish the service at the reduced rates?

Mr. PITNEY. Again the gentleman is misinformed in the matter——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They would not accept a given amount.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well; that is a very different question—the prescribed amount.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And they have not asked to be paid more.

Mr. PITNEY. Of course they would know enough about the law to know that it would do no good to ask for more, but they have asked to be paid the very last penny, when another company can make plenty of money by charging $10 or $20 a lamp less per year.

But it is claimed—and if the gentleman from New Hampshire does not claim it I am glad to hear the disavowal from his lips—it is claimed that we have adopted a sort of Congressional policy of monopoly for the District of Columbia, to which I may answer that if Congress has adopted that policy it is time for Congress to depart from it, because the people of this District and the public Treasury have suffered a great deal by reason of the policy of monopoly, so far as it has been pursued here, and Congress has shown a very proper disposition to get rid of it, and has manifested that disposition in the appropriation bills that I have already referred to for the years 1890, 1891, and 1894, in which they expressly commanded the District Commissioners to invite proposals, and that from different companies.

With regard to gaslighting there is a monopoly. With regard to telephones there is a monopoly, and it is partly a matter of necessity, because the company which controls the telephone patents will not license more than one company in a given territory, and it is necessary, also, perhaps, from the fact that every telephone user wants to be in communication with every other telephone user, and that can be done only by having a single central telephone station.

With regard to street railroads, there is absolutely no such policy. We have here, I think, half a dozen street railroad companies, and while the lines do not run on the same streets, except for a block or two here and there where it is necessary, just as these subways will run for a block or two on the same routes, the railroads do parallel each other, and they do compete in rates, in speed, in improvements, in accommodations, in everything that the patrons of the roads are interested in.

With regard to electric lighting, there has been no policy of monopoly inaugurated. In the first place, there is no express grant of any monopoly, and Judge Cole, in his recent decision, points out and lays stress upon the very significant fact that during all the years when, as the old company claims, a monopoly was given to it by Congress, the name of the company is nowhere mentioned in the appropriation acts. No monopoly has been given, and the practice of the Commissioners of advertising for electric lighting has been almost constant, and has been known to Congress all the time. The subway investigation that has been in progress from 1890, seeking to get some system of subways to be used by all the companies on paying rental to the public, is an evidence that the policy of Congress is against monopoly in these matters.

But there is another reason which ought to have some influence in deciding the question whether it is good policy to allow a single company to control. The gentleman from New Hampshire asked awhile ago whether this United States Electric Lighting Company had not tried to put its wires underground. If he will listen now to what I say, I will enlighten him on that subject. It is claimed at the present time by the official representative of the United States Electric Lighting Company that when the prohibitory act of 1888 was passed they had 250 to 400 miles of overhead wires in the District of Columbia. The claim is so widely in divergence not only from the facts as they appear from the official record, but from the statement of the same representative and of the counsel of the same company before the same subcommittee at another time, that I am unable to believe that a mere mistake of statement has been made. A year ago, and again this year, the statement was made that instead of 250 or 400 miles of overhead wires, as they now claim, they had in 1888 only 50 miles of overhead wires. But even this was a gross exaggeration.

What is the fact? I happen to have with me a copy of an official publication of Congress entitled Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 15, second session Fiftieth Congress, which contains a report of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia to Congress on the subject of removing electric-light wires and placing them underground. That report contains a statement by the Engineer Commissioner of the quantity of overhead and underground wires of every company in the District in the fall of the year 1888, just after the prohibitory law was passed. On page 18 of that report is a table, made up in part from information furnished by the company, which shows that at that time the United States Electric Lighting Company had but 4 miles of conduits underground, and in those conduits but 16 miles of wire, and that the company had only 10 miles of overhead wires. They now claim to have had 50 miles; and when more convenient they have claimed 250 to 400 miles. The official record shows that at that time they had but 10 miles; and that does not mean miles of streets; it means 10 miles of individual wires. The table shows this, and, besides, if you will turn to the map entitled "Plate 3," appended to this same report, you will find the mileage of streets covered by the underground and overhead construction of the United States Electric Lighting Company laid down in blue and red, respectively. On applying the scale to the red lines, which show the overhead construction, you will see that the mileage of streets covered by the overhead construction at that time was but 4 miles; and on those 4 miles of streets they had 10 miles of wire.

What is the fact to-day? Since that time the Commissioners have had no power to grant authority for a single mile of overhead construction, and not a single mile has been lawfully constructed. But the fact is that to-day, instead of there being 4 miles of streets covered by the overhead electric-light wires of the United States Company, they have 8 miles of streets covered by them; and instead of 10 miles of wires involved in overhead construction, there are now 60 miles of overhead electric-light wires maintained by that company. At the very least, 50 miles of those wires were erected and are now kept up in violation of law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman explain how that was done?

Mr. PITNEY. They did it in the night, without permit.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Why did not the Commissioners compel the company to take down those overhead wires?

Mr. PITNEY. The discovery has only been made since this controversy was raised. And I desire here and now to praise the Commissioners for having instituted a suit in court to require that company to take down those unlawful wires. But when they begin to take down the wires, you will find sensational headlines in the newspapers, and the champions of this dear old monopoly will be rising up all over Washington and denouncing the Commissioners for depriving citizens of their electric lights.

I say again that neither this company nor any other company that has the full control in a matter of this sort can be trusted to care for the public interests. And it is very remarkable that when an inquiry is on foot before a committee of either branch of Congress, if there is anything in it that can form a basis of criticism against the Commissioners, the newspapers will have great headlines, and sensational language will be used about it. But when a serious charge is made against the United States Company, showing that they are trying to use the power of a venal press to coerce the Commissioners and Congress into working their will, the newspapers do not say a word about it.

On the 7th of January, 1897, when this matter of electric subways was under investigation by a Senate committee, the president of the competing company laid before that committee a written statement showing upon good evidence that within six months previous to the 1st of December, 1896, the United States Electric Lighting Company had paid to a certain newspaper in the city of Washington $18,000 for 18,000 lines of reading matter to advance its interests before Congress. The offer was made to this new little company to go into some arrangement of that sort, but the offer was declined. In order, however, to draw out the manager of the newspaper, the president of the company appointed an interview at a prominent bank in this city and had a stenographer behind a screen, and had also present prominent citizens whose integrity could not be questioned. And there the proposition was made by that newspaper manager to sell them for $10,000 the use of the columns of the newspaper to influence Congress to give them the legislation that they wanted in opposition to this old company. At the same interview the statement was repeated that the old company had paid to the newspaper $18,000 for publishing 18,000 lines of matter in opposition to the new company.

Mr. PEARSON. Would the gentleman be willing to name that paper, or would it be indiscreet?

Mr. PITNEY. The Washington Times. And since the name of the newspaper has thus been brought out, I want to say that I understand that since the date in question the control of the newspaper has passed into other hands. I am not now attacking the newspaper as at present owned. But so far as I am aware, no denial of that charge has been made by the United States Electric Lighting Company, and, so far as I am aware, no denial of the charge has been made by the newspaper or by any newspaper. I understand that a disavowal has been put in; and the present proprietor says mellifluously that he is not concerned in the old quarrels of the former management. But I do not understand it is denied that the United States Electric Lighting Company has paid that newspaper $18,000 for having articles printed that would conduce to its sole control of the electric lighting of this city.

I can tell the gentleman something more. At the close of the last session of this Congress, while I had the honor of serving as one of the conferees on the District appropriation bill, it was brought to our attention by a distinguished citizen (and it was not news to me) that under what was understood to be the decision of Judge Bingham the new company would be absolutely unable to string a single wire in the District unless relief should be given by an amendment to be ingrafted upon that bill by means of the conference report; and this Senator, the senior Senator from Tennessee—there is no secrecy about his name—appealed to the conferees to put on that bill by way of amendment a clause which would give the Potomac Lighting Company the power to maintain its system in little Georgetown, west of Rock Creek, for the purpose of private lighting, they having, as was claimed, no power at that time to do it. I undertook to look into this matter, to investigate it; and while I did not tell anybody that I was going to introduce that amendment, it was known that I was considering the matter, and that it might be brought up on a certain Monday, the 8th day of June.

I was called upon either on Saturday or Sunday, and which day it was I can not now recall, by a man who was my friend, and who gave me warning in a friendly way, from information he had received, that if I dared to put anything into the bill then pending that would interfere in the slightest degree with the United States Electric Lighting Company, I would be attacked in the Washington Times. On Monday I offered the amendment on the floor of the House, which, after full discussion, was adopted by a vote of 178 in the affirmative to 1 in the negative, and on the following day the Washington Times contained two long articles, covering some three or four columns of its space, devoted largely to a personal attack on me for having had, as they doubtless considered it, the audacity to offer an amendment that interfered with the sole control of the United States Company.

Mr. MORSE. It did not hurt you.

Mr. POWERS. Did not that fact, let me ask the gentleman, contribute largely to your election in a close district?

Mr. PITNEY. I think not at all. I knew perfectly well the motive underlying it. The purpose was to contribute to my defeat. These men knew that my district was a close district at best, a district that was usually Democratic. This article was sent into my district with the hope that it would contribute to my defeat.

I did not attach much importance, Mr. Chairman, to that proceeding then, and I do not propose to do so now. I relied for my justification simply upon the merits of the proposition, upon the fact that the amendment—that the proposition—met the approval of this House by an enormous majority, and I relied upon the language of my distinguished friend and colleague from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] who praised me in the debate and commended the amendment as conducive to the public interests.

Mr. POWERS. But did not this attack upon you, as a matter of fact, contribute to your success in that election?

Mr. PITNEY. Well, something did; I do not know what it was.

Mr. ANDREWS. Votes.

Mr. PITNEY. Now, I should like to go a little further in this matter, but it seems hardly necessary. I thought then that I should like to make a personal explanation. I actually sought to gain the floor at the time for the purpose of making a personal statement with reference to the matter; but the House was very busy in the closing work of the session and I was extremely busy in conference committee, and I had no opportunity to take the floor.

But the important question now, Mr. Chairman, is not whether the newspaper told some falsehoods about me. The question is, who paid for the publication of them? I think there is no doubt that the United States Electric Lighting Company paid for it. I will not dignify the articles in question by going into them in detail. That, I think, is unnecessary. I shall not dignify them except to say that they were absolutely and entirely without foundation or excuse so far as I am concerned. The same articles, I may say in passing, attacked also the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who then happened to be in the Speaker's chair, and this attack was just as absolutely without foundation as in my case. All I am concerned in now, therefore, beyond a mere denial, is to make plain, if I can, the danger that lies in giving to any company a control, or a chance to claim control, of so important and valuable a matter as the exclusive privilege of lighting in the District of Columbia.

I presume the same subsidized newspaper, from that time to this—for I do not have the privilege of reading the Washington Times, except very rarely—they may have used the opportunity all last summer and fall to continue their attacks upon me. I have no doubt that the Washington Times has vilified and maligned the Commissioners during that whole period—at $1 a line; has denounced the Potomac Company during the same time—at $1 a line; has no doubt impugned the motives of the Secretary of War for his action in the premises—at $1 a line; and I know that in the latter part of November or early in December, Mr. George Truesdell, one of the Commissioners of the District, was charged with being personally and pecuniarily interested in the public work—at $1 a line; and I may say in passing that the then manager of that newspaper is now under indictment for libel in that particular case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed——

Mr. PITNEY. I only want five minutes longer——

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that my colleague have five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. PITNEY. But, Mr. Chairman, the old company claims to be a home company. It says the people here are interested in it; that it is one of their pets. Well, in point of fact, it is a West Virginia corporation, not organized or incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, although the laws are open to such incorporation. But it avoids taking a charter here, for that would subject it to local taxation and judicial control in the District, both as a going concern and as to its assets in case of insolvency. The competing company, on the contrary, is a District company, locally controlled and taxed. But the United States Company seem to think that outsiders ought not to come in here, and they treat this city of Washington as if it belonged to some favored few. My view of it, Mr. Chairman, is that the city of Washington is the people's city, and that all the people of the country ought to have an equal opportunity to come in here with their capital, their enterprise, and their wealth, and aid in beautifying and building up and benefiting the city. The theory of the free-corporation law is that wherever any number of persons are willing to embark a given amount of capital in a given enterprise, they ought to have the right to do it in the form of a corporation, the same as they would have a right to do in the form of a partnership, subject to proper limitations and restrictions and control, set forth in the laws for that purpose. That kind of a charter the competing company has taken out. That kind of a charter the old monopoly has refused to take out.

I want to say in all frankness that one year ago, as a member of the subcommittee, I had some hesitation in recommending a provision that would require the building of additional subways for the purpose of lighting the streets. Since then my investigation of the matter, my knowledge of the facts and the law, have convinced me that it is the only way of dealing with this electric-lighting question; and passing entirely by—for it is entirely aside—the question as to whether we shall have public subways, owned and controlled by the municipality and rented out, I say that until we get them there is no way of securing good service and cheap service for the public and for the citizen except by having some such competition as this.

Kill it off, if you choose. Drive the competing company out of existence, as you would do if you followed the line of argument that is laid down for you, and you then give notice to all the world that nobody's money is desired to come in here if it infringes upon any concern which happens already to be owned by the favored few.

Competition in electric lighting is necessary as to price. That is a matter of history. This old company charged 60 cents a night, and said that they could not do it for less. Congress at last compelled them to come down to 50 cents, and they said they could not do it for less. But the moment that a new competitor appeared on the horizon, the United States Company said before our committee, last year, that they would do it for 28 cents a night, amounting to $100 a year; and then, when the provision which we had put in expressly providing for competition was knocked out on a point of order urged by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER], and the danger of competition became less, when next the Senate put in its amendment that struck out the provision expressly requiring the Commissioners to advertise for bids, when the old monopoly thought its grip was going to be renewed upon the electric lighting, immediately an amendment was put on the bill raising the price from 28 cents—as the House left it—to 40 cents, the then existing price. But finally, as a result of conference, it was reduced to 30 cents; and now the old company say, "We can not do it for 30 cents; there is no money in it; but we are obliged to submit." The new company say they can do it at a profit for 28 cents. I should want to look at the books of the old company and find out what the cost of electric lighting is. I should want to know how much of the $18,000 and other sums spent for like purposes has been charged to the electric-lighting account. I should want to know whether they have used half of the appropriation for subsidizing the newspapers and the other half for paying for the light.

Competition would be beneficial also to private consumers, not only as to price, but as to extension of the lines. This old company has been in this District, with all this control that it has had—accidental control, and not intentional—it has been here for fourteen years, and yet that company is lighting a comparatively small section of the city. Whether there is an understanding between them and the gaslight fellows, that they shall not tread too much upon their preserves, I do not know; but the new company is a new enterprise—I have not a bit of interest in it, any more than I have in the other, I do not know who the stockholders are, any more than the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] does—and I say it should be our policy to encourage that kind of an enterprise in coming here.

Competition has proved beneficial with regard to the character of the subway construction. These subways of the old company have provision for only one or two wires or at the most six wires, and on their own showing they are unsuited for the work that they have to do and have not sufficient capacity to take the overhead wires which the company are now maintaining, either lawfully or unlawfully; whereas the new subways are built on the most approved plan, and are certified by the Commissioners to be in exact accordance with the report of the experts who have been investigating the matter; so that if municipal subways are adopted we can take these very subways, either by condemnation or otherwise.

Competition is necessary in order to give improved processes of manufacture. It appeared in our hearings last year that since this old plant was introduced the manufacturing processes have been so improved as to furnish electric light and permit it to be manufactured for a fraction—I do not know exactly how much, but say one-half—of the former cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PITNEY. I would like about ten minutes more.

Mr. GROUT. I ask that the time of my colleague be extended until he shall complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey may be extended until he completes his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PITNEY. But now what is the trouble with some people? The supposition is that "our friends" are in the United States Company. I have received a letter myself—I do not say that there is any impropriety in it; it has no effect upon me—I have received a letter from the counsel of the United States Electric Light Company asking me to be easy with them, because my friends are stockholders in the United States Electric Company and because the stock is largely held in the banks as collateral security for loans. And so it appears that a large portion of the loanable capital of the banks of this city is tied up in the stock of the United States Electric Light Company, and therefore each lender has quite a little motive in seeing that the domain of the old company is not trenched upon by the new company. I do not know what friends of mine are interested in the United States Electric Light Company. The counsel of the company does not furnish me a list of their names, and hence I can not communicate with them. I have no knowledge of the management of this company or why it is improperly trying to influence Congress, but I will say to my friends who are in that company, if they are responsible for it, that they are engaged in a very discreditable business. [Applause.] The sooner they change the management of that company and the policy it has adopted toward Congress and toward the Commissioners the better.

Now, I do not want to spend any further time on this matter; but there is one other thing that I ought to go into. That is, the claim that the action of the Commissioners in granting a subway permit to any other company than the United States Company is a violation of some understanding that is stated to have been arrived at at the time when the District bill was in conference last year. That is a subject which I ought to know something about if it is true.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Some verbal or private agreement?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; some verbal or private agreement. Well, if so, the parties to it would be whom? Would it be the United States Company, or the Potomac Company, or the Senate conferees, or the House conferees, or the Commissioners?

I am speaking at the present time, Mr. Chairman, in vindication, as I said at the outset, of the action of the Commissioners in this matter. I want to say that so far as I remember, subject to correction by the recollection of some other member of the committee, the Commissioners of the District were not consulted at all in regard to the conference report so far as it affected electric lighting.

Was there an understanding on the part of the Potomac Company? Why, the representatives of the Potomac Company came before the committee of conference and simply said: "We are in this fix; we are in this trouble. We will accept anything that you will give us at your hands." They did not agree that because the bill had been amended in conference so as to authorize them to do private and public lighting west of Rock Creek they would not avail themselves of any rights to bid for public lighting east of Rock Creek.

The United States Company, did they have any understanding in this matter? From seeing what had been the effect of the provisions in former appropriation bills, were they satisfied that they were going to get all this work? Did they expect that by the express enactment giving to the Potomac Company a charter west of Rock Creek it would by implication be debarred from competing with the United States Company for the public lighting east of Rock Creek? The United States Company may have had such an understanding. If so, they were caught in their own snare, and, like the fox who said, "This is a trap; I'll lightly come and lightly go," they perhaps were "caught by the light, fantastic toe."

So far as the House conferees are concerned, and I think I can speak for my colleagues as representatives of this House, standing in advocacy of the views of this House and knowing that the views of this House were against monopoly in that or any other similar matter, we did not intend to consent expressly or impliedly to any perpetuation of the control of a monopolistic company. But the company may have understood it so. I think possibly there may have been a misunderstanding on the part of some persons. They may have misunderstood the effect of the previous decision of Judge Bingham. They may have supposed that that was meant to prevent permits for public lighting. If so, that was their mistake. The fact is, the opinion did not touch the question of public lighting. It went simply to prevent the extension of lines for private lighting.

But the law is upon the statute book, as you will find it. There is such an expenditure for public lighting, calling for such a number of lamps, authorizing that to be spent not for maintaining existing service, but for maintaining service in streets where service then existed and for necessary extensions. And inasmuch as there was an obligation to light only by subways, it followed that it could not be done in any other way than by granting subway permits to the party with whom the contract was to be made.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. If my colleague will permit me, with reference to the letter of the counsel of the United States Company, does not my colleague think it proper that that letter should be given for publication in the RECORD? For I believe, and I think he believes, that these men in high places who attempt unduly to influence legislation should not go unwhipped of justice. I think the letter of the counsel should be given for publication in the RECORD.

Mr. PITNEY. I have no objection to that; but I will state for myself that I am not so easily influenced that a letter of that sort would have the slightest effect on either my official or my private conduct.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I know that as well as anybody can know it, but my object in making the suggestion is that the writer of that letter may be punished.

Mr. PITNEY. Oh, I do not think the letter contained anything that would render the writer punishable. It did contain an intimation that "my friends" were interested in the United States Electric Lighting Company. That may be true. If so, I have served notice on them to the best of my ability as to my opinion of the conduct of that company.

The following is the letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1897.

MY DEAR PITNEY: A letter similar to the following was sent by Col. A. T. Britton, representing the United States Electric Lighting Company, to Hon. W. W. GROUT on the 18th instant, and I have taken the liberty of reproducing the most of it, and send it to you in this form, simply requesting, as a friend, that you will carefully read it and weigh the statements therein contained—which, I can assure you, are borne out by the facts in the case. I know you are familiar with this matter, and that it may be a work of supererogation for me to rehearse what this letter contains, and may be regarded as somewhat presumptuous on my part, inasmuch as I have just been employed by the United States Electric Lighting Company—owing to Mr. Britton's severe illness, which precludes the possibility of his acting further in the matter at present:

"The United States Electric Lighting Company is purely a local institution. Not more than 3 per cent of its stock is owned outside of the citizens of Washington. It commenced in 1884 with a small capital of $54,000, and when electric lighting and power were entirely experimental, and when royalties and excessive charges for plant absorbed everything. For years its operation was dead loss, and when it was beginning to be remunerative Congress forbade further extension of its overhead wires and compelled it to construct underground conduits. That system was then wholly untried, and experts contended that it could not be made a success. Nevertheless, the company loyally obeyed the will of Congress, and made a success of its underground work. It has gradually taken down all its wires, except about 4 miles in the aggregate, and would have had those under ground by this time if the Commissioners had not refused the necessary permits. The company has spent $1,300,000 upon its plant and underground work, and until 1896 has paid 8 per cent dividends and no surplus. In 1896 it was forced to reduce its dividends to 6 per cent. That is all the present profit in its operations, both public and private. Naturally, as a local institution, its stock has gradually been purchased by our citizens, until it is (except 3 per cent) wholly owned by individuals and estates resident here. Its stock has been a favorite collateral in our banks and trust companies, and it is probably fair to say that in the aggregate at least $500,000 have been and are to-day loaned upon it by our various financial institutions. You can readily understand how large a percentage of our local capital is invested in this institution when I say that the aggregate capital of all our national banks and trust companies only equals $8,500,000. Many of your warmest friends here are deeply interested in the continued prosperity of this company, and would exceedingly regret to see you unadvisedly aid in impairing its standing, or in lending your strong support to its competitor.

"The Potomac Electric Light and Power Company is a corporation of very recent creation, and almost wholly owned outside of the District. Captain Crosby, formerly of the United States Engineer Corps, and his partner, Lieb, together with certain New York parties, whose names they decline to disclose, the Cramps, of Philadelphia, and Mr. F. C. Stevens, of this city, constitute the company. The Cramps furnished the electrical machinery in the Georgetown power house, upon which there is still due them $120,000, for which notes were given but not paid at maturity. To recover that indebtedness constitutes the interest of the Cramps, who are not believed to be taking any further active part in the operations of the company. Pretty much all the money being expended now, and for some time past, is supposed to be advanced by Mr. Stevens. This company first secured possession of the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad by purchase of a bare majority of the stock at very low figures, part of which was paid for, and part wholly bought upon credit and never since paid for. It then secured possession of the Bethesda road, connecting at the District line with the first-named road, by purchasing a note of $13,000 secured by mortgage upon the Bethesda road and property, and by buying up a judgment lien of $6,000. Then it secured foreclosure of the Bethesda road, and bought it in at the foreclosure sale. Prior to that time, to operate the Georgetown and Tennallytown, the Bethesda and the Glen Echo roads, the power had been supplied on contract with the Georgetown and Tennallytown road from its power house, which was amply able to do the work. Having got possession of above two roads, these new owners have operated them in a most unsatisfactory way. Their cars are filthy and full of disease; their roadbed and equipment has not been kept up, and the operation is so poor that one never knows when he starts upon a trip whether he will reach the end of the route or not. Then, in total disregard of the rights of their mortgages, the power has been transferred to a new plant, in which the railroad has no interest and entirely removed from its line. It is situated upon a tract south of the canal, and near the Aqueduct Bridge. The ground is leased, and, as aforestated, the machinery thereon has not been paid for. It was undoubtedly the expectation of Crosby and Lieb (Potomac Company) to utilize their plant to supply to the three railroad companies above named, and to the Metropolitan, and to the Capital Traction Company, and to all other parties desiring electric power, even including the United States Electric Lighting Company. Their theory was that a naked manufacturer of the power, backed by a purely modern plant, could make and deliver the fluid at much less cost than parties to whose business its manufacture was only an incident. Crosby and Lieb did not realize their expectations. The large railroad companies declined to consider a plan which would leave the operation of their roads in the hands and at the mercy of an outside corporation.

"Thereupon, and to try to find some way to utilize their plant, Crosby and Lieb turned their attention, with the aid of the District Commissioners, to getting into the territory of the United States Electric Lighting Company for purposes of both public and private lighting and power. It is beyond question that the House Appropriation Committee in the District bill, reported by you in February, 1896, intended to authorize that competition, so far as the public lighting was concerned; but it is equally beyond question that, after five different conferences, the Senate declined to accept that provision, and that finally a compromise was adopted which gave a limited authority to the Potomac Company to extend its overhead poles and conduits west of Rock Creek only; and to the United States Company authority to extend its conduits east of Rock Creek, and as far north as Mount Pleasant, Washington, and Columbia Heights.

"I do not intend to weary you with any analysis of all the things which have since been done by way of litigation, contracts, permits, or wild scramble to open the public highways in the dead of winter. The Cockrell resolution does not affect, nor attempt to affect, anything done before the date of its approval. It simply prohibits after its enactment further opening of the streets by any company, except in case of public necessity, within prescribed limits, and at discretion of the Commissioners, until Congress has acted definitely upon the general subway proposition. Unless stopped by further legislation, the Commissioners can quite as lawfully continue to make contracts, and to parallel existing conduits, and to tear up street after street without limit, and it is that sort of thing which this resolution will stop, and which it ought to stop.

"Of course, the idea of competition in a general way in the affairs of life strikes one as the correct thing. But is it so in relation to the use of either the surface or the subsurface of the streets of a city by these quasi corporations? Except in cases of necessary outlet for a few squares in the center of a city, you restrict the use of a street to one railroad, and even discountenance new lines on parallel streets, rather requiring extensions by existing companies. You have for fifty years restricted one gas company to the west of Rock Creek and another to the east of Rock Creek, and so on with similar corporate uses of the public streets for other purposes. The policy, and the wise policy, of Congress has always been to retain with an iron grip the regulation of these corporations, but to forbid their duplication. You have regulated their equipment, determined their motive power, fixed their charges, etc.; but you have thus regulated one company, rather than to have stimulated the growth and competition of speculative rivals, who simply tore up the sidewalks and roadways, poisoned the public health, and inconvenienced everybody in their wild scramble for a freeze out or a sell out.

"Consider for a moment the necessary result of a general authority for competition between these two electric-lighting companies. It will be a struggle for existence. The present contract of the Potomac Company expires next June, and most of that contract year will have expired before the company will be in position to light a lamp. The gross pay under their contract for a whole year is only $12,500, and they can not complete in time to earn more than three or four thousand dollars at the most. The net of that sum will clearly not pay them for putting down more than $100,000 of underground work; and they must necessarily expect to find a future profit of competition everywhere with the United States Company in both public and private lighting. Then it comes to this, that on June 30 next, and similarly each other year thereafter, these two companies must bid against each other for the public lighting, and all through each year, from day to day, for private lighting. One will get it this year, the other will get it next year. One gets A's house or store this month, the other offers greater inducements and gets it the next month. Each will be willing to do it for less and for less, finally for nothing, and then with a chromo. Is there any good to public interest out of this wild and unbusinesslike competition? Streets constantly torn up, public health impaired, everybody inconvenienced, and finally one or the other company goes into bankruptcy or sells out, consolidation occurs, and the public is left to pay a fair profit upon the cost of the duplicate plant. These are not imaginary results. They have been experienced over and over again in the cities of this country, and the public has always finally paid the bills and endured all the annoyances.

"I hope that you will give this subject careful consideration. I have said before that your friends are interested in the success of the United States Electric Lighting Company. I do not for a moment imagine that this fact would in the slightest degree influence your legislative action against your clear judgment as to the requirements of public interest; but in a case where all other things are not only equal, but where the preponderance of equities is clearly with the United States Electric Company, such consideration may properly have weight with you. We do not have many local stocks or bonds, and we naturally feel that when it comes to lighting our own houses, stores, and streets, we ought to be permitted to do so with our own local company, equipped with our own moneys, rather than to be forcibly turned over to a set of outside speculators."

The only thing I would add to the foregoing is that it seems to me a totally unnecessary and wanton defacement of the beautiful streets of this city, without any adequate return to the people, inasmuch as it is absolutely the province and within the power of your committee to fix the rate for electric lighting which must be observed by this company, and it is entirely competent for you to fix as low a rate as could possibly be obtained as the result of healthy competition or any other kind of competition that would not result in the ruination of both companies, and that is not "good public policy."

Sincerely, W. W. DUDLEY.

Hon. MAHLON PITNEY,
152½ Eighteenth street NW., City.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I give fair notice that the appropriation bill reported here contains an increased appropriation for electric lighting; that it contains a limitation of cost to 25 cents per light per night, and that that increased appropriation and that limit of cost will provide for a large additional number of lights which are to be put upon streets that are not now lighted by electricity, I want to say also, and I think the House will agree with me, that it will be the duty of the Commissioners of this District to pursue the same line of conduct as last year, and to invite proposals for this work in obedience to the organic law. Whether they have discretion to accept proposals from one company or from another company, as the case may be, is another question; but I suppose it to be their duty to accept the proposals of the lowest bidder. Returning again to the recommendations of the Commissioners, last year they submitted to us a schedule which designated certain streets to be lighted by electric lights, and, generally speaking, those were the streets occupied by the lines of rapid transit. This year they have submitted a schedule of the same streets, with a few others, and if we accept their recommendations, it will be their duty, as I understand it, to provide for the completion of that service.

The appropriation of this year will take care of the Metropolitan north-and-south line. Last year they recommended us to take care of the east-and-west line also. The appropriation was not sufficient for all, but I understand they are going to take care of a part of the streets on which that rapid-transit system runs. I think the Commissioners ought to advertise for proposals, and I hope that when they do advertise there will be no misunderstanding on the part of anybody as to the law under which they do it.

I have said thus much, Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the law and of the facts which led the Commissioners to advertise and to grant contracts, in pursuance of the decision of the court, which sustained their action in advertising, and said it was lawful and proper for them to give permits not only for the lights for the District of Columbia provided for in this bill, but for the lights in the public parks provided for in the sundry civil bill.

I think that so much was due to the Commissioners. They have been denounced and abused and vilified, and not one-tenth of the statements contained in the newspapers and made elsewhere about them have been founded upon facts. The facts are as I have stated them.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the committee for some five minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a very peculiar statement and argument from the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY]. I presume that nine-tenths of us do not care anything about the particular complaints he has aired before us. In our minds there is no purpose to favor one company or another. I do not suppose there are three people in this House who know a single stockholder in either of these electric-lighting companies. It is to be noted, however, that one company has been subjected to vituperation and the other to compliment. I do not care which has received the compliment or which has received the vituperation.

The question for the members of this House is over and above all that. It is the question of the service which is rendered to the people of the District of Columbia; the question whether or not the pavements of this city have been cut up and rendered less valuable by giving the service to this new company, which, the gentleman says, is a competing company; and whether the people of the District and the people in the District have not been put to great inconvenience, loss, and danger by the cutting up of these new pavements. These are the questions to which we should devote ourselves in considering this proposition. No one, I suppose, has ever found any fault with the Commissioners for permitting either company to extend its line in the proper order in which those lines would naturally be extended.

The complaint has come because the one company has been given privileges and powers over and beyond those of the other company. The complaint has come because the one company, having already its underground conduits laid in the streets, has not been permitted to run wires through those conduits. The complaint has come because when conduits have been laid and wires laid in them by one company, the other company has been given powers which naturally would have gone to the company having already its wires laid, and, I presume, vice versa. But in any event, I do not understand that this House or the Commissioners, or any person connected with either company, can justify the digging up of miles of concrete pavement to permit one company to render a service which the other could have rendered without being obliged to disturb the pavements for over three blocks; and all this when this House, by power which it has exercised for years and years, controls the limit of price at which electric lighting shall be furnished. If the limit of last year was not low enough, it is within the power and the policy of this House to make it low enough. I do not care how low you go, if you do not destroy the lighting. For these reasons one company or the other company is or ought to be as good to this House, to the Commissioners, and to the people of the District of Columbia as the other. Personally I do not know, so far as I am aware, one stockholder in either company, except one individual, and I have not seen him or heard from him for over a year.

But there is general complaint from one end of this city to the other—not in the newspapers alone, but from all the people—that the Commissioners have committed an outrage upon the people of the District in exercising the power which they have exercised in this city. And I take it that the newspapers of this city have done nothing in the world except to voice the sentiments of the people of the District. If the gentleman knows of their being bribed in one connection or another, I have no objection to his airing it upon this floor or anywhere else. I have no such knowledge. But it is generally understood in this city that there was a trade by which certain public lighting and certain electric companies were turned over to another company; that it was done in pursuance of an understanding which has culminated in the digging up of the streets, as I have suggested. That is what is complained of. And whether the Commissioners have been in it or whether they have not been in it, is not a matter that concerns me except so far as I would criticise any man, whether a Commissioner or not, who is false to his pledge.

Mr. PITNEY. I understood the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] to intimate that the Commissioners had some interest in what is known as the competing company. I only want to say that the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations took pains to make some inquiry a year ago in reference to that matter, because a rumor of that sort had been suggested, and the result of our inquiry was that the charge was shown to be absolutely without foundation. It was shown that the Commissioners, or any of them, had no interest whatever in the Potomac Electric Lighting Company. I wish to say this in justice to the Commissioners.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know whether they have any direct pecuniary interest in the Potomac Electric Lighting Company or whether they have not. But I do know that if they had such pecuniary interest in the Potomac Electric Lighting Company, they could not have been any more subservient to its interests than they have been.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROUT. If no gentleman desires to be heard further——

Mr. MAHON. I should like to occupy a few minutes.

Mr. GROUT. How long a time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MAHON. About ten minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] says may be true, and what the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] says may be true, about these competing companies. But I want to say that in the part of this city where I have resided during the last four years the streets have been constantly dug up, in season and out of season. I believe the time has come in the history of this city when Congress should take into its own hands the business of lighting the streets and parks, as well as furnishing water to the people of the District. I believe that the city of Washington, under the control of this Congress, ought to put in its own plant for lighting the streets and the parks. I believe that this city should establish and maintain its own waterworks. I stand ready to vote in favor of ousting all these corporations that are undertaking to do this kind of work for the citizens of the District.

This city is not like other cities. This is a city of parks. I am satisfied we can light this city at one-half the expense now incurred by doing the work through these corporations. And these magnificent streets, which have been laid out at a cost of millions of dollars, should be under the absolute control of the city, and when once they have been dug up and conduits laid for the conveyance of electric lights, that should be an end of the matter.

The legislature of my own State, Pennsylvania, passed some years ago an act authorizing municipalities to put in their own plants for electric lighting and for supplying water. In pursuance of the authority thus given, the city in which I reside owns its own electric-lighting plant; it owns its own waterworks. We can furnish arc lights to the citizens there at their residences and in the great stores for $42 a year. We can furnish them at one-half the cost which has to be paid in other cities. And we light our city free. All because we make the light ourselves and furnish it for commercial purposes and on a commercial basis.

We furnish the very best water also in the State. The city gets its water free of all charge. The water taken by our citizens and the light furnished them by the city meet all of the expense of carrying on the waterworks and the lighting establishment, and gives the city free both its light and water.

Now, if you are going to let this company in, and tear up the streets, all right. I know nothing about either the Potomac Company or the United States Company. I do not take any stock one way or the other. They are all "tarred with the same stick," and they are all after a franchise; all want this monopoly. But we ought to stop, Mr. Chairman, this everlasting digging up of the streets of this city. Have you given a new company the right to come in and tear up the streets? When will the streets be let alone? When may we walk through the streets and find them not dug up in some place or another by this eternal operation?

Mr. PITNEY. I will say to the gentleman that for my own part I would not trust any company as a monopoly. I would not intrust any such interest to the control of any one company, unchecked by competition, as far as the interests of the city are concerned. I have no desire, as far as I am individually concerned, to give them a monopoly.

Some years ago we passed a law providing for a report on the conduit system for a subway for all of these electric wires. That matter has been before the committee for a long time, and no satisfactory report has been made, but it is progressing, and we have gone far enough to know that it will cost from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000. Congress has so far not seen fit to authorize such an expenditure.

Mr. MAHON. I want to give my friend from New Jersey a little bit of information that comes from a man who is slightly older than he is, as to the way these corporations work. He may go on with this system, and what will be the result? He will find both of these corporations sleeping in the same bed, and covered by the same blanket, within a very few years. That is generally the history of their transactions.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, if no further debate is desired, I ask for the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read as follows:

For assessor's office: For assessor, $3,500; three assistant assessors, at $3,000 each; two assistant assessors, at $1,600 each; two clerks, at $1,400 each; three clerks, at $1,200 each; draftsman, $1,200; three clerks, at $1,000 each; assistant or clerk, $900; clerk in charge of records, $1,000; clerk to board of assistant assessors, $1,200; clerk, $900; license clerk, $1,200; inspector of licenses, $1,200; messenger and driver for board of assistant assessors, $600; in all, $33,300.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking if this is a change in the existing law.

Mr. GROUT. You refer to the personnel of the office?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GROUT. No; no change whatever.

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Street sweeping office: For superintendent, $1,800; assistant superintendent and clerk, $1,600; clerk, $900; chief inspector of streets, $1,200; three inspectors, at $1,200 each; ten inspectors, at $1,100 each; three assistant inspectors, at $800 each; foreman of public dumps, $900; messenger and driver, $600; in all, $24,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of this bill.

I would like to ask the necessity of this number of twenty-two employees, at a cost of $24,000, simply to inspect the work, as I understand it, of street sweeping, for which there is a total appropriation of more than $100,000?

Here is for inspection and superintending a sum nearly or fully 20 per cent of the whole cost of the work done. It seems as if the appropriation of "bread to sack" was exceedingly small, and I would like to have an explanation from the chairman as to the necessity for this large expenditure in this regard.

Mr. GROUT. Is it the size of the inspecting force that the gentleman objects to, or the smallness of the appropriation?

Mr. HEPBURN. The objection is as to the diversity between the two.

Mr. GROUT. Well, I will say that this provision was for the first time put on in the last bill, these officials being placed upon a salary at that time. Previously they had been paid in a lump sum for the work, but the same force has been employed for years in the work. It requires careful and thorough inspection, and if the proposition of some can be carried into effect—that is, the doing of the work by day labor instead of under contract—the force will have to be still further increased.

In the last appropriation bill these persons specified here were given the same pay in the shape of a salary that was paid to them before in the lump sum, and that amount was deducted from the general appropriation. But they are carried in the bill in the same form now as last year.

The committee are not informed that the work is overinspected. On the contrary, there was a year ago, as I remember it, an application for a larger number to be put on salary. I do not recollect that any claim was made before the committee that this force could be decreased. If other gentlemen on the committee had such information I would be very glad to yield to them for a statement. But no such information came to me.

Mr. PITNEY. They wanted an increase of salary.

Mr. GROUT. Yes; they wanted an increase of salary, as the gentleman from New Jersey suggests; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the committee will observe that this paragraph makes provision for the pay of employees in the street-sweeping force. I take it for granted that their duties are confined solely to the sweeping of the streets. If you turn to page 16 of the bill, you will find an appropriation there for sprinkling, sweeping, and cleaning: "For sprinkling, sweeping, and cleaning the streets, avenues, alleys, and surburban streets, $130,500," and "for cleaning snow and ice from cross walks and gutters, etc., under the act approved March 2, 1895, $1,000." All that this work of cleaning the streets amounts to is, in its total, $131,000. Now, in order to see that that work is properly done, that that money is properly expended, the sum of $24,000 is paid to officers who have surveillance of the matter. It does look to me as if there was a very marked disproportion, that it is better to have some other contractor who will do the duty properly without this expensive watching.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman will observe that while the words "street cleaning" occur above there, they very likely are misleading, for it says: "Chief inspector of streets." I take it that does not mean inspection of sweeping alone, but inspection of all street matters.

Mr. PITNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] that he is mistaken about that.

Mr. HEPBURN. It must apply to cleaning the streets.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then the language is misleading.

Mr. HEPBURN. Because we have already read the paragraph that provides for general superintendence. That is in the engineer's office, and in that there are fifty-nine comparatively high-priced officers. This, I think, refers solely to seeing to it that the contract of the street sweeper is properly attended to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will suggest to the gentleman that the police force might give a little attention to that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there might be other methods. This is certainly a very extravagant one.

Mr. PITNEY. There is some street sweeping that is not done by the contractor. There is a street force which is engaged in the work of sweeping by day labor, although this is perhaps only experimental. The Commissioners deemed that it would probably be more suitable, because the contractor only goes over the streets at night, and the day laborers can work in the daytime without interfering with traffic.

Mr. HEPBURN. This appropriation is expended, is it not, in supervising the sweeping of the streets?

Mr. PITNEY. It is the office work of the street-sweeping department, and I will say to the gentleman that previous to the now current appropriation bill the salaried force was paid out of the lump appropriated for cleaning the streets; but by reason, I think, of a Senate amendment, placed on the bill last year, which is the current law, there was a special appropriation for the payment of the force, leaving the whole amount appropriated for the sweeping of the streets to be available for that work itself, irrespective of supervision. I will say to the gentleman that if he will find out a way to reduce this item we shall be with him.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will move to strike out the words in the eighth and ninth lines, "three inspectors, at $1,200 each." And then I will move, later on, to strike out the word "ten," in the ninth line, and insert "five." If, before the bill gets through Congress, the Commissioners can satisfy the committee, or the conference committee, which will undoubtedly have charge of this bill, that this large number of high-priced inspectors is necessary, of course there will be no objection to the item being restored.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is aware that the conference committee would have no jurisdiction over the matter unless it were made the subject of a Senate amendment. I suggest that the motion be deferred, and the debate on it be deferred until the close of the bill, so that we may have an opportunity to inquire.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman's amendment is pending?

Mr. HEPBURN. The amendment may be pending, if you please; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that this paragraph be passed over, to be referred to later, with the gentleman's amendment pending. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read as follows:

Board of examiners, steam engineers: For compensation for board of examiners of steam engineers in the District of Columbia, three, at $300 each, $900.

Mr. DOCKERY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That chapter 87, page 664, of volume 28, Statutes at Large of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, that is a very wise amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve a point of order until I know what this is. The gentleman is repealing a statute, and I do not know what it is.

Mr. DOCKERY. The act of February 13, 1895, authorized contractors to be paid what are called "board rates," notwithstanding they may have contracted to do public work at a less rate. The sum involved in that legislation, in claims already filed against the District of Columbia, amounts to $753,526.75, and the interest thereon will probably carry the amount up to $1,300,000.

Mr. MEREDITH. Do you offer this as an amendment?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, to repeal it. This is in the interest of the taxpayers of the District.

Mr. MEREDITH. I make the point of order that it is new legislation. The gentleman is seeking to repeal the statute, as I understand it.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman does not want to raise the point of order, I hope.

Mr. MEREDITH. Yes; I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. I say now, Mr. Chairman, there never was a law placed upon the statute books of this country more inequitable and unjust than the act of February 13, 1895, which is sought to be repealed. The act gives to certain contractors under the old board of public works what were called "board rates," when they themselves had agreed to accept compensation at lower rates. Now, then, this act was passed, as I understand, without the indorsement of the Commissioners of the District, and we seek to repeal it, in harmony with their views, and in harmony with the views of the auditor of the District.

Mr. MEREDITH. The gentleman is mistaken. I understand the Commissioners recommended its passage. It has been passed, and these people, if they are justly due anything from the Government, ought to be paid. The Commissioners held the view that it was a proper act when it was passed.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MEREDITH. No; I am not mistaken.

Mr. DOCKERY. We will get the act.

Mr. MEREDITH. The point of order I made is well taken.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, I concede that the point of order is well taken; but I insist that the gentleman from Virginia ought not to raise this question of order until he has given it a thorough examination, because I am satisfied from the statement which has just fallen from the gentleman's lips that he is not fully advised as to the facts.

Mr. MEREDITH. If my friend will permit me, I will make the statement to him that I believe I remember the facts thoroughly. I have examined into it, and if these people are justly due certain sums by the Government of the United States, and if the people of Washington are owing them, they ought to be paid, and they ought to have an opportunity to go into the courts to ascertain what is due. The gentleman is seeking by the amendment to cut them off, and the Government is undertaking to do a dishonest act. I will oppose that as vigorously as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the question of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply wanted to explain the circumstances under which this bill was passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; this is not the last of this amendment, and I desire to be heard. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MEREDITH. I think the Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, sir; I concede that the point of order is well taken. There is no contention between the gentleman from Virginia and myself on that question.

The act of February 13, 1895, as it passed the House, provided that these claimants should have the right to go into the Court of Claims and should be allowed such prices as are reasonable, just, and equitable. The bill as amended by the Senate changed that provision and required that the court shall allow the rates established and paid by the board of public works. The board of public works in 1874 was of unsavory memory and unenviable reputation. Their acts, I may say, are largely responsible for the fact that the people of this District were deprived of local self-government. This board did not let contracts for public works to the lowest bidder, as the law now requires.

The work was apportioned out to various contractors. Now, then, under that system, to illustrate, my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] might have secured a contract to do certain work for $100,000, a contract just, equitable, and fair, which he consented and agreed to. Subsequently this board of public works came in and established what they called "board rates."

Mr. Chairman, under these "board rates" $150,000 might have been allowed for the same work, work which Governor SAYERS agreed to perform for $100,000. Under the administration of the law which is sought to be repealed the gentleman from Texas can secure an allowance of $50,000 additional, the difference between the contract price and "board rates."

Mr. Chairman, this bill involves, as heretofore stated, according to the report of the auditor of this District, claims already filed aggregating $753,526.75, which, with interest, now amount to $1,300,000.

I can not believe that my friend from Virginia, whom I know to be an able and efficient Representative, will, after examination, insist upon the point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words as to the passage of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], and which was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. In the last Congress Mr. Cobb, of Alabama, who, I believe, was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, asked unanimous consent for its consideration. I objected and held the bill up for several days, but finally Mr. Cobb came to me and assured me that the bill to which I had objected had received the indorsement and approval of the Commissioners of the District.

Now, I desire to acquit Mr. Cobb of all blame in this matter, for I believe him now and I believed him then to be an honest man, incapable of knowingly doing a wrong thing. Upon his statement, I withdrew objection to the bill. After it had passed, however, I was informed by the auditor of the District of Columbia that instead of the bill involving an expenditure of $30,000 or $40,000, it involved an amount probably exceeding a million dollars. I said to the auditor, "Why, then, did the Commissioners of the District indorse and recommend the bill?" He assured me they had not done so, but that they had indorsed and recommended a different bill, which had been introduced, but not the one that had passed. Thereupon I went to see the President to get him to veto the bill, but I found that he had approved it under the supposition that it had been indorsed and recommended by the Commissioners of the District.

My judgment is that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri ought to be put upon the pending bill, because the House in the last Congress would never have passed the bill, nor would I ever have waived my objection so as to enable it to come before the House, if I had not been assured in the most positive terms that it did not involve an expenditure of over $30,000 or $40,000, and that it had received the indorsement and approval of the Commissioners. That is the way, as I remember it, this bill passed the House in the last Congress, and I do think my friend from Virginia ought, under the circumstances, to withdraw his point of order and allow the House to consider the amendment.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do not the very facts which the gentleman has just stated in relation to how this bill was put through the House suggest that we ought not again to legislate hastily in the matter in any direction? Ought we not to have a bill introduced for the repeal of this act, referred to the proper committee, and reported upon by that committee before we take action?

Mr. SAYERS. My impression is that such a bill has been introduced and sent to the District Committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that any such bill is pending before the District Committee.

Mr. SAYERS. I know nothing about the matter myself, and only what I have heard from the auditor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of ancient history here, after the point of order has been sustained, can be of no moment. The only point of objection which the gentleman presents to the bill seems to be based upon the fact that the amount which is probably owing to these people is much larger than was supposed at the time of the passage of the bill. Now, if it was right to pass the bill for a smaller amount, the fact that the amount is found to be greater than the gentleman supposed it to be does not change the principle at all. If it was right to pass this bill for a less amount, the fact that the amount due turns out to be more than the auditor of the District or the District Commissioners thought to be due does not change the principle. The principle still holds good, that if the money was due to these people they ought to be paid.

Mr. SAYERS. That is not the only point involved in this case. There is also the point that the bill was passed through the House upon the supposition that it had received the approval of the Commissioners of the District, whereas, in fact, it was another bill and not this one that had received their indorsement.

Mr. MEREDITH. I do not know whether that be true or not, Mr. Chairman, but this I do know to be true, that these people can not get one cent unless they prove their claim, and if they can prove that this District or this Government owes them money, whether $1 or many thousands of dollars, in good conscience they ought to be paid. They will have to present and prove their claim before they can get anything, and if they have been kept out of their money for thirty years the criticism of the board of public works, which comes from my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], can have no weight in a question of this kind. The real question that presents itself to me is, Is this money due to these people? If it is, the Government, as it expects its citizens to be honest, ought to be honest itself in paying what it owes to its citizens.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken in two or three points. In the first place, it is not true that the only objection to the act rests upon the fact that it was passed by reason of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] having been misled. The act of 1895 in itself has no merits. It is not true that it was ever recommended in its present form by the Commissioners. The Commissioners recommended, or rather they acquiesced in, the passage of the original bill, but the bill that was really passed was a substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and striking out every guaranty that the original Senate bill contained for any really equitable ascertianment of the amount that might be found due on these contracts.

It is not a question whether these men can recover fair amounst or not. The act as passed requires the Court of Claims to reopen this case, and to give these men the "board rates," and this in spite of the fact that it has been adjudicated over and over again that they were not entitled to board rates, either under their contracts or by reason of any equitable consideration. I will read for the information of the committee the bill as the Commissioners were willing to have it passed. It provided that the court should allow the claims "so far as the prices allowed and paid were reasonable, just, and equitable," and that a rehearing might be had, provided a motion should be made within ninety days after the approval of this act; "and no rehearing shall be granted upon any other point."

The substitute struck out those guaranties, and provided that there should be a rehearing whether the "board rates" had been claimed in the original claim or not, and that the contractor should have judgment for the board rates, whether there was anything in his contract or in the equities of the case to entitle him to the board rates or not.

Mr. HENDERSON. What were these claims?

Mr. PITNEY. I will explain to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is very interesting.

Mr. PITNEY. I have taken some pains to investigate this matter, because the auditor of the District comes and pleads with the Committee on Appropriations to grant this relief to the Treasury. The claims involved aggregate, with interest, $1,400,000.

Mr. TALBERT. If the amounts are due they ought to be paid.

Mr. PITNEY. There is not a particle of merit in any one of these claims. There is not one of them that is less than twenty-three years old; there is not one of them that has not already had its day in court; there is not one of them that has not been passed upon by an auditing board and by the Court of Claims, and a finding had upon it. The present proposition is to reopen those old claims.

Mr. HENDERSON. What kind of claims are they?

Mr. PITNEY. I will give the gentleman that information.

An act passed February 21, 1871, organized the District government, providing for a governor and a legislative assembly. Under that act we had a governor. Gentlemen may remember something of the history. Section 15 of that organic act prohibited the legislative assembly from granting or authorizing any extra compensation to any contractor over and above the terms of his written contract. By an act passed in 1874 the previous form of District government was abolished, and a government by commissioners was established. Subsequently the act of June 11, 1878—what is now known as the "organic act"—took the place of the act of 1874. Every one of these claims originated during the period between 1871 and the date of the passage of the act of 1874. During the interim there was under the then form of government what was known as a board of public works, to which was given control of the improvement of the city, with power to make contracts.

That board did make hundreds of contracts. They were in writing, and were signed by the parties who were to do the work. After the contracts were made, in many instances—in other instances, before the making of the contracts—the board placed on its minute book a resolution that 30 cents per cubic yard should be allowed for excavation, we will say, and $6.50 per cubic yard for the construction of mason work. Those were, in fact, two of the resolutions. But before the 30-cent rate was fixed some contractors had agreed to do certain work for 20 cents per cubic foot for excavation; and before the $6.50 rate had been fixed for building masonry, some contractors had agreed to do such work for $5 per cubic yard. Those claims are involved here.

Again, after those rates had been fixed—after the board had said that 30 cents was a fair price—and I will admit that for any work done without written agreement, without the measure of compensation being prescribed in the contract, that might be taken as a reasonable rate because it had been fixed by public resolution; yet, in the light of that announcement written on the minute book, that 30 cents per cubic yard was a fair rate, in the face of that resolution, contractors came and agreed to do the work for 20 cents—one-third less than the board rate. They entered into this agreement by reason of special circumstances connected with the character and convenience of the work, etc.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to strike out the last word, and will yield my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey be extended for five minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. We want to hear this whole explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PITNEY. Under the act of 1874—that is, under the new government—there was an auditing board established to audit these very claims, and that board proceeded to do the work. During the following six years they audited and adjusted hundreds of these claims, and the money was paid. Then, inasmuch as after the passage of the act of 1878 there were still large numbers of claims remaining unadjusted, Congress passed the act of 1880, of which, I believe, I have a copy here, but it is not necessary to read it. It conferred jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to examine claims against the District of Columbia arising out of contracts made by the board of public works or by the Commissioners; that is, by the board of public works from 1871 to 1874 and by the Commissioners subsequently to 1874, including these claims. The claims now in question all arose during the operations of the board of public works, are based on what is known as the "board rates," and originated prior to 1874.

Under the act of 1880, 398, suits were brought in cases where contracts had been made and on prices varying in amount, and in almost every case those suits were tried and adjudicated and disposed of.

Mr. HENDERSON. And the parties held to their contracts?

Mr. PITNEY. The parties were held to their contracts in some cases, but equitable considerations were allowed to intervene in others. The auditing board and the court itself gave potency to such considerations where they seemed just. In some cases judgments were rendered against the contractors; in some cases their claims were allowed, and in some cases counterclaims were set up on the part of the District for overpayment to contractors by reason of these advanced rates in violation of the law. For in many cases, in spite of the law prohibiting rates in excess of the contract price, the work had been paid for at board rates in express violation of the statute, and it was regarded by the court as a claim on the part of the District against the contractor; and the District was allowed to set this claim up in the hearings. Judgments for $382,000 principal and $164,000 interest were rendered, and were settled under the organic act by delivery to the judgment creditors of the 3.65 bonds.

Now, the act of 1895 was introduced for the purpose of providing for the reopening of these old claims against the District, and it conferred jurisdiction on the Court of Claims for that purpose. And I am not now finding fault with the Commissioners for recommending it in the original form.

Mr. SAYERS. May I ask the gentleman what committee reported the bill?

Mr. PITNEY. It was reported by the District Committee in the Senate.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Was that bill, as reported in the Senate, recommended by the Commissioners?

Mr. PITNEY. Not at all. They did not recommend that bill. The bill they did recommend is as different from this as day is from night. This is the original bill of the Senate.

It provides:

That in the adjudication of claims heretofore brought under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved the 16th of June, 1880, no sum in excess of the sum named in the written contract allowed by the late board of public works or the late board of audit of said District, and paid to said claimants for work done or materials furnished for said District, at the rates established and allowed by said board of public works and known as "board rates," shall be pleaded or allowed as a set-off or counterclaim—

That is to say, that if he was paid the value that must be allowed—against any claim for work done or materials provided for said District, so far as the prices allowed and paid were reasonable, just, and equitable.

That was intended to allow the contractor the board rate if there were reasonable grounds for such allowance; but it does not compel the court to allow it when the man agreed for a different amount of compensation and accepted it.

And in all cases where such set-off or counterclaim has been allowed against such claim, in cases heretofore brought as aforesaid, the claimant shall in such cases be entitled to a rehearing of his case: Provided, That a motion therefor shall be made within ninety days after the approval of this act, and no rehearing shall be had or granted upon any other point.

Now, the amendment struck out all of the bill after the enacting clause and put in this language:

That in the adjudication of claims brought under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved the 16th of June, 1880 (21 Statutes at Large, page 284), the Court of Claims shall allow the rates established and paid by the board of public works—

Whether reasonable or not, or whether equitable or not—and whenever said rates have not been allowed—

Whether claimed or not—and men did not always claim them—the claimant or his personal representative shall be entitled, on motion made within sixty days after the passage of this act, to a new trial of such cause.

That is, whether the claim was made or not, or whether the contractor demanded such allowance or not, this was construed to mean that they could have a retrial on the question of the board rates, and also on any and all other questions, however fully litigated and justly settled on the previous trial.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If that is a correct history of the situation—and I doubt not that it is absolutely correct, because the gentleman makes the statement—why did the Commissioners recommend what they did recommend?

Mr. PITNEY. The bill that the Commissioners recommended would not have done any damage, for it would have simply allowed the Court of Claims to make inquiry into the reasonableness of the compensation to be allowed to these contractors, and to grant them a rehearing on that point only.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They ought not to have done that.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well; but this is so much worse that the other is trifling in comparison. Now, let me give you some few samples: Here is the case of Peter P. Little, administrator of Michael Shiner. Shiner, on the 16th and 20th days of September, 1871, made two contracts in writing, by the terms of which he was to receive 20 cents per cubic yard for the grading of Eleventh street east from Pennsylvania avenue to H street north. By the contracts it was stipulated that the work should be commenced on or before the 21st and 25th days, respectively, of September, 1871. It was also provided that unless the work was suspended by order of the officers of the District it should be completed within ninety days from the date fixed for its commencement. There was a contract binding him to complete it at 20 cents per cubic yard before the 1st day of January, 1872. He was behind-hand in the doing of the work, but he did it and accepted compensation at 20 cents per cubic yard. On the 8th of January, 1872, after the contract was made and after it ought to have been completed, the board of public works made the following order:

"Ordered, That the prices of grading be fixed at 30 cents per cubic yard, including hauling, etc."

This order was not made until the month following the date fixed by the contract for the completion of the work.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did that refer to that particular contract?

Mr. PITNEY. No; it did not say so.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was general.

Mr. PITNEY. If there was any honesty in the resolution, it did not refer to that contract. It simply meant that where no other price was stipulated, where work was employed to be done at a reasonable price, this should be deemed a reasonable price. It was not on its face an abrogation of that contract.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is there any light on the reasons that led the board to this action?

Mr. PITNEY. Oh, the scandals were very great, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HENDERSON. Were any new requirements placed on the contractors or anything of that sort?

Mr. PITNEY. No new requirements whatever. The scandals were very great, and resulted in piling up $20,000,000 of indebtedness upon this District, and this was a part of the occasion of it.

Now, let me give you another instance. Here was a case where two contractors agreed to grade—and I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] will listen to this.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have heard enough to satisfy me.

Mr. PITNEY. A contractor agreed to do certain grading at 20 cents a cubic yard, including hauling. Thereafter, when a measurement was made, he was allowed payment at the rate of 30 cents per cubic yard, nothwithstanding his contract. He also was allowed for hauling away material, in addition to the price for grading, 15 cents a yard for 30,640 cubic yards of earth. He receipted for this amount in full on the 2d of June, 1873. Afterwards, when the board of public works had ceased to exist, on September 23, 1875, he presented to the board of audit a claim for additional compensation for depositing this earth in the canal. The board of audit were induced to allow him 15 cents per cubic yard for earth deposited in the canal, in addition to the price for hauling.

Now, I say that in law, in decency, and in equity the District of Columbia should set that up as a counterclaim against any other claim arising on the part of the same contractors, and the courts have so decided. This act that we are now proposing to repeal says that a man, although he never claimed it before, shall have a rehearing, and the court shall allow him the board rates, whether he ever claimed them or expected to get them or not, however fraudulent and however unlawful they may have been. Now, I could give you a dozen such instances, but this is a sample.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is enough.

Mr. PITNEY. This act went through in the closing hours of the Fifty-third Congress, under a total misapprehension on the part of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Not only a misapprehension but misinformation.

Mr. PITNEY. Which I attribute to a misapprehension on the part of the gentleman from Alabama who is absent, and I would not insinuate anything else.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. As I understand it, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] offered an amendment to a paragraph of this bill. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] raised the point of order that it was new legislation, and the Chair sustained that point of order, ruling it out, and yet, as I understand it, gentlemen are still discussing that amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. It is by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is discussing a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not understand that. I thought he was still discussing the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. PITNEY. Now, I will close by saying that these claims now pending are claims in which the law compels the court to allow a certain measure of compensation, although the contractor deliberately agreed to take a less compensation, and got his contract at a lower rate and accepted payment on that basis. It gives a rehearing upon the whole case, although other points may have been and were adjudicated contrary to the contractor, after a full and fair hearing. It gives him the board rates, whether he ever claimed them or not. It involves claims aggregating at the present time, with interest, $1,400,000, every one of which claims arose before 1874, and every one of which has been heretofore heard and determined in an equitable jurisdiction.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HENDERSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments House concurrent resolution relative to printing and binding 6,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 33, United States Department of Agriculture, entitled The Cotton Plant, etc.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 1061) granting pensions to Gray's Battalion of Arkansas Volunteers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 3622) to increase the pension of Caroline A. Hough, widow of Brig. Gen. John Hough; and

A bill (S. 3623) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Gould Carr, widow of the late Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Joseph B. Carr, United States Volunteers, deceased.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order that I may say a word upon this amendment, for I raised the point of order. In raising it I did so not because I felt any particular interest in the matter myself, but because of the fact that the gentleman from Virginia had a moment ago stated to me he would raise the point of order, and his attention not being called at the time, I raised the point of order for him.

Mr. Chairman, if this law which the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] proposes to repeal is so exceedingly objectionable, offensive, and improper as we would be led to believe by the remarks of the gentlemen, members of the Appropriations Committee, who have preceded me, it seems to me the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which has jurisdiction and charge of a repealing measure, should have been called to it. There has been no bill introduced, so far as I am at present informed, during this Congress, or at any time since it was ascertained that this law was so offensive, to repeal it; and if the officers of the District government have gone before the Committee on Appropriations and made their complaints against this law, they simply went to the wrong place, because under the rules of the House the Committee on Appropriations can not originate provisions repealing this law, and they should have gone to the District Committee.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, it was stated before us, on the part of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, that a recommendation and request was sent a considerable time ago to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House and to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate concerning this bill, and that no action or suggestion of any action has been taken by them during this session.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that it is not customary for simple recommendations to be sent by the District Commissioners to the District Committee. When they desire to call the attention of the committee to any matter, they prepare a bill and send it to the committee, or some member of the House, and it is introduced and then referred to the District Committee.

Mr. PITNEY. I give the gentleman notice that I will this evening or to-morrow introduce such a bill and call his particular attention to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, but I inform him that he need not call my special attention to it. I imagine when the bill is introduced it will receive proper attention. The Commissioners, and no other person representing the District government, so far as I am informed, has been before the Committee on the District of Columbia in connection with this law. A great many bills are introduced and referred to the committee that are never fully considered by the committee, as we all know. The District Committee, however, has not ignored any bill repealing the law complained of. They have not acted adversely on any such bill, nor considered any such bill during the present session of Congress that I know of. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think it is proper under our rules to have a motion made here, as this is now, to repeal a section of law of the Revised Statutes, or the Statutes at Large in this case, without having it considered by some committee of this House. This is an unsafe way to legislate, and is forbidden by the rules, and it will result, if we follow it up, in as much unwisdom as it seems that we were guilty of in the enactment of the law which we did pass. It is in the interest of good order and sound legislation that I insist that the repealing measure should be referred to the proper committee and be properly considered.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask the gentleman if this bill which was passed was not reported favorably by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why, I take it that the point the gentleman makes is true, and that it was reported by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Cobb, who was a very careful legislator, as we all know, an able lawyer, and a conscientious member of the District Committee and of this House.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And if a mistake was made, the proper way to correct it would be to have a bill introduced and have it properly referred to the District Committee, have it considered and acted upon first in committee, and then here. We have no difficulty in getting measures from the Committee on the District of Columbia considered in this Congress. We have a day every two weeks, and up to this time this House has been exceedingly generous and kind to the District Committee. We have been able to have all our measures considered, if not passed. I speak for the Committee on the District of Columbia in saying that they endeavor to pay attention to all bills that are introduced and referred to that committee; and if any member of this House will introduce a bill repealing this law we will give the subject full and fair consideration.

I do not know whether all the facts have been stated by gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee who have spoken. We all know this, Mr. Chairman, that there is an effort by them to cut down appropriations. That may be commendable, to save a dollar. We all know that the members of the Committee on Appropriations are exceedingly zealous to see that side of the question, and they do not always see the other side, as suggested by my friend from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH]. It seems to me that the best way would be to have this bill considered by the District Committee, where both sides can be heard; and if this law should be repealed, I have no doubt the District Committee will report the repealing bill, and next Monday it can be considered, and if the law is objectionable, as it is stated to be, it can be gotten rid of.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word. It is only within the last two or three days that this matter was brought to my attention. I examined it, in connection with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], and determined, to my own satisfaction at least, that there was no reason why the law should not be repealed; but, on the contrary, every reason why it should be repealed forthwith. After reaching that judgment, the accomplished clerk of the House Committee on Appropriations prepared, at my request, an amendment which I have offered. That amendment has gone out on a point of order, and we will try to find some other way to reach the question, so that the House shall have an opportunity to vote upon it at an early day.

Mr. SAYERS. They will be a long time getting their money.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10167, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That on Wednesday, February 10, the whole of the gallery, except that which is designated as Executive, diplomatic, and reporters' galleries, and two sections of the east end of the public gallery, shall be reserved for the use of the families of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates, and their visitors.

The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order.

The Speaker shall issue to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate two cards of admission, and only persons holding these cards shall be admitted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I also present another privileged report, which I send to the desk.

I demand the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I reserve my time, Mr. Speaker.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 10th day of February, 1897, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the election of President and Vice-President of the United States is always, in this Republic, under all circumstances, a matter of momentous consequence and importance to the people and to the perpetuity of the Government itself. Never in time of peace, perhaps, has a question arisen along the line of our historical pathway that has made more unpleasant feeling in the minds of American citizens than did the controversy that grew out of the unfortunate complication in the electoral count of 1876–77. It has not been very important, however, hitherto that some gentleman or some set of gentlemen have raised doubts as to how certain States of the Union may have actually voted. Going back in the history of our country, I find that it was claimed by a most distinguished editor, as long ago as 1844, that certain States of the Union voted one way and were certified the other; but most of the talk of that character has grown out of exceptional facts and circumstances, has been attributed largely to partisan zeal in the midst of partisan conflict, and has ultimately passed away.

I hold in my hand, however, a document published by very high authority, a document known as Senate Document No. 56, in which it is claimed, and purports to be shown with whatever force is given to the showing by the publication of this document by the Senate of the United States, that at the last election, in sixteen States of this Union, a vast body of illegal voters were admitted to the polls and a vast amount of illegal voting took place, enough to have changed the entire result of the election. I have looked into this subject-matter very carefully and have had prepared by a most capable gentleman certain tables which I have here and the contents of which I desire to state to the House in a very few words. There is not a partisan suggestion in them. There is simply a review of the votes given by every State in the Union as compared with the census returns of men above voting age in 1890.

I have taken a great deal of pains with these tables—I say "I," but the work has been accomplished in large part by more skillful hands than mine. I have gone into a complete analysis of the votes cast in the several States, only four of which cast more votes than there were men of voting age in 1890. I may say that there were four States of the Union—Iowa, West Virginia, Indiana, and Illinois.

A MEMBER. Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. Iowa, West Virginia, Indiana, and Illinois. Ohio did not vote within 5,000 of her voting strength, as returned by the census of 1890. I do not care to be led aside in that way.

Mr. MEREDITH. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEREDITH. I suppose the object of the gentleman is that the minds of those who are to witness the Presidential count may be prepared for the result.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am placing in enduring form (if I can have the opportunity) a complete showing of the vote of the country, upon a nonpartisan basis, as given to each of the candidates for President, as given by the agricultural States, as given by the manufacturing States, and as given by the New England States. And I pledge my word that there is nothing here——

Mr. MEREDITH. Does it go into the question of the money expended?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That would be partisan. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon my statement that these documents contain no reflection upon any party or any party management or any candidate I may be permitted to publish with my remarks these tables and statements.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to publish certain tables with his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask whether these documents will occupy more pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than those figures which were submitted the other day?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; they do not amount to one-fourth or one-tenth part as much, so far as the figures go.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not propose to object.

Mr. TERRY. We had the RECORD almost filled the other day with statistics of this kind.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Those related only to the vote of a single State that had been specially assailed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will accept a suggestion, I suggest that instead of his printing these figures as a part of his remarks—to which I shall not object—they be printed as a document. The document to which he referred in his opening remarks is a document of the Senate. If it is desired that these figures be preserved in permanent form, so as to be valuable for reference, the object will be much better accomplished by printing them in document form than by simply printing them in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should have no objection to printing these figures in the form suggested, but certainly if they are valuable—and I would have no hesitation in submitting that question to the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee himself——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I accept the gentleman's statement on that point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They will be much more accessible to the general public in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than in a document, which will be laid away in the document room.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I question that very much. I think they will be more accessible as a document, because they can then be put on file and can be had at any time. In my opinion, the RECORD would be about as good a place to hide them as any that could be found.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If after the matter appears in print the gentleman should find that it ought not to be hidden in the RECORD, he can then make a motion to print it in document form.

Mr. TERRY. I think it ought to accompany Agricultural Bulletin No. 3. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I do not care to object. If this document has actually been prepared by the gentleman from Ohio, and is really nonpartisan, I think it should be printed wherever the gentleman asks to have it printed. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection; and the request of the gentleman from Ohio is granted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am indebted for the tables and comparisons which will follow to Mr. O. P. Austin, a newspaper man of remarkable ability in the line of investigation and compilation such as follows.

The Senate document is as follows:

The figures, it will be seen, amount to a charge made in an official document that there was a "fraudulent excess" of votes in the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, West Virginia, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Oregon, California, Tennessee, Missouri, and Texas in the recent election, aggregating about 750,000 votes. From whence came the alleged facts? I do not know. I do not believe that any Senator has given the sanction of his own statement to this compilation, but it is interesting, in view of this official publication and the legitimate inference that might be drawn therefrom, to examine the figures with some care. The States in which the charges are made that there was "fraudulent excess" of votes cast, and the excess of votes in each case, are as follows:

Pennsylvania	94,000	Iowa	77,500
Maryland	8,700	Wisconsin	31,400
West Virginia	8,300	Minnesota	12,100
Ohio	94,500	Oregon	7,200
Michigan	29,700	California	22,000
Indiana	39,700	Tennessee	30,400
Illinois	137,000	Missouri	41,100
Kentucky	43,300	Texas	46,100

Let us see how this will bear scrutiny and investigation. The United States census of the year 1890 gives the total number of males in each State above 21 years of age, or, as it is usually called, the voting age. It is reasonable to assume that in every one of these States there has been a very considerable increase in population, and consequently in the voting population, in the six years since the census was taken. Take Pennsylvania, for instance. Her population increased 22.77 per cent in the decade from 1880 to 1890, and it is reasonable to assume that it increased 15 per cent from June, 1890, to November, 1896, and that the voting population would increase in about the same proportion. Pennsylvania's voting population according to the census was in 1890, 1,461,869. The actual vote of the State in 1896 was 1,188,354. Thus it will be observed that the vote of 1896 was 273,515 below the number of males above 21 years of age in the State in 1890. If the population of Pennsylvania has increased since 1890 at the rate which it increased between 1880 and 1890, the male population above 21 years of age in November, 1896, must have been 1,680,000, or practically a half million greater than the number of votes actually cast. Yet this official statement charges that the vote which amounted to 1,188,354 was 94,000 in "fraudulent excess."

Take the State of Maryland as another instance. The vote cast according to the official document was 240,866. The total number of males of voting age in Maryland in 1890 was 270,738, or 30,000 greater than the number of votes cast in 1896; yet the charge is made that there was a "fraudulent excess" of votes amounting to 8,700.

In Ohio the charge is that the "fraudulent excess" of votes was 94,500. Let us see. Ohio, according to these figures, gave 1,011,576 votes. There were in Ohio, in 1890, according to the census, 1,016,464 males of voting age, or more than 5,000 in excess of the number of votes cast in 1896. Ohio increased her population 14.83 per cent in the decade from 1880 to 1890, and it is reasonable to assume that, with the great prosperity which has attended her development of manufactories in the natural-gas region in the past few years, the increase of population from 1890 to 1896 has been, at a very low estimate, 10 per cent, which would bring the male population of 21 years and upward to 1,117,000, or 106,000 in excess of the number of votes cast.

In Indiana and Illinois the total number of votes cast in 1896 slightly exceeds the total number of males above 21 years of age shown by the census of 1890 in those States. In Illinois the excess of votes in 1896 above those of voting age in 1890 in that State is less than 19,000. Illinois gained in population in the decade from 1880 to 1890 24.32 per cent. In view of the great number of people drawn to Chicago during the World's Fair period, many of whom remained there, it is reasonable to suppose that the rate of gain since 1890 has been quite as rapid and that the increase of population and in the number of persons of voting age is fully 16 per cent. This would bring the number of males of voting age in the State up to 1,243,000, or 232,000 in excess of the number of votes actually cast. In Indiana the increase of population has been much more rapid, probably, than in Illinois, because of the wonderful development of the natural gas region of that State, where industries have been extremely active and prosperous even while there was depression and absolute inactivity in nearly all other parts of the country. The total male population of Indiana above 21 years of age in 1890 was 595,066, but with the phenomenal growth of population which it has had since that time it has probably increased 100,000, so that there is every reason to believe that the total number of voters in the State was in 1896 nearly or quite 700,000, while the total number of votes cast was only 637,284.

It is unnecessary to pursue in detail the investigation of the relation of the votes cast to the voting population in all the States charged with a "fraudulent excess" of votes in this official paper. The following table gives the number of males of voting age in each of the States in question in 1890, and beside it the number of votes cast in 1896. When it is remembered that the natural growth of population in these States in the six years since the census of 1890 is from 10 to 15 per cent, it will be seen that in no case was the vote actually cast in 1896 nearly as large as the number of males over the age of 21 years which must have been in these States on November 3, 1896.

Table showing the number of males of voting age in 1890 and the number of votes cast in 1896.

State.	Males above 21 years of age in 1890.	Votes cast in 1896.
Pennsylvania	1,461,869	1,188,354
Maryland	270,738	240,866
West Virginia	181,400	198,221
Ohio	1,016,464	1,011,576
Michigan	617,455	544,278
Indiana	595,066	637,284
Illinois	1,072,663	1,091,166
Kentucky	450,792	445,934
Iowa	520,332	521,551
Wisconsin	461,722	448,106
Minnesota	376,036	341,539
Oregon	111,744	93,846
California	462,289	294,000
Tennessee	402,476	321,999
Missouri	705,718	674,726
Texas	535,942	540,000

The student of the above table should bear in mind constantly that it is entirely proper to add from 10 to 15 per cent to the figures of the first column in order to obtain approximately the number of male persons of voting age in the States in question at the time of the vote on November 3, 1896.

There is another way of looking at it. Apparently the assumption is made that the number of votes to which each State is entitled is based in some way upon the number of votes cast in 1892, for in this table of charges the figures of the election of 1892 are included and compared with those of 1896. But if you take the trouble to examine the figures of the Presidential elections during the past twenty years, you will find that the vote of 1892 was the lightest, in proportion to the population, that has been cast in a Presidential election for many years—perhaps the lightest at any time since the close of the war.

Certainly the percentage of gain in the total vote in 1892 over the preceding Presidential election is lighter than has been the case in any Presidential election since 1872. The following table gives the number of votes cast in each Presidential election since 1868, the increase in the number of votes, and the percentage of increase.

Table showing the total vote cast in each Presidential election since 1868, the gain in the number of votes in each election, and the percentage of gain in the number of votes cast.

Year.	Total vote cast.	Gain over preceding Presidential election.	Per cent of gain.
1872	6,466,165	741,479	12.9
1876	8,412,733	1,946,568	30.1
1880	9,209,406	796,673	9.4
1884	10,044,985	835,579	9.1
1888	11,380,860	1,335,875	13.3
1892	12,059,351	678,491	5.9
1896	13,951,283	1,891,932	15.6

It will be seen by a study of the above table that the vote of 1892 was an unusually light one, being a gain of but 5.9 per cent over that of the preceding Presidential election. This is the lowest gain made at any time in the quarter of a century which this table covers. The vote of 1892 was evidently the lightest, in proportion to the voting population, that has been given within the period in question.

It would not be surprising, therefore, if the increase in 1896, compared with 1892, should be an unusually large one, especially in view of the fact that the interest in the election was more intense than was perhaps ever felt before, at least in the memory of the present generation. An examination of the percentage column, however, will show that the actual increase over 1890 was only 15.6 per cent, while in 1876 the increase over the preceding Presidential election was 30.1 per cent, and the increase in 1888 over that in 1884 was 13.3 per cent—nearly as much as 1896, on which occasion the interest in the campaign was unusually great and the efforts to rally every vote by both sides were exceptional. A study of this table will show to those who examine it that it can not be successfully charged that the total vote of the nation in 1896 was excessive or out of proportion in its increase, especially when it is remembered that the vote of 1892 was unusually light, and that the percentage of gain is estimated upon that light vote.

In order to give, however, those who assume an excessive vote in certain States the full advantage of every fact, let us examine the votes in the States of which complaint is made and compare them with the vote of 1892, confessedly a light vote. Pennsylvania increased her vote in 1896, 18.4 per cent as compared with the vote of 1892, and it is said that there was a "fraudulent excess" of 94,000 in Pennsylvania's vote. No complaint, however, is made of the fact that the State of Montana, which was as earnest for the free coinage of silver as was Pennsylvania against it, increased her vote 21.9 per cent.

Indiana increased her vote 14.7 per cent in 1896 as compared with 1892, yet no complaint is made of the fact that South Dakota increased her vote 17.1 per cent, nor does this document refer to the fact that Indiana in the election of 1876, when she went Democratic, increased her vote 26.3 per cent. Iowa increased her vote 17.6 per cent, and it is charged that 77,500 "fraudulent excess" of votes were cast, but no comment is made of the fact that North Carolina increased her vote 17.8 per cent, nor is reference made to the fact that Iowa in 1876 increased her vote 35 per cent.

California increased her vote 9.1 per cent in 1896 as compared with 1892, and the charge is made that 22,000 "fraudulent excess" of votes were cast; but no reference is made to the fact that the State of Nebraska increased her vote 11.1 per cent in the same election.

Maryland increased her vote 12.9 per cent in 1896 as compared with 1892, and although the charge is made that a "fraudulent excess" of 8,700 votes was cast, no objection is made to the fact that ten States giving their votes to the Populist-Democratic candidate increased their votes in a much greater ratio than did Maryland, nor is the fact referred to that Maryland herself in 1888, when she went Democratic, gained 13.5 per cent over her own Presidential vote in the preceding election.

Ohio, of which complaint is made as casting 94,500 "fraudulent excess" of votes, increased her vote 19.1 per cent in 1896 over 1892; yet the fact is contemplated with entire calmness that Wyoming, a State as ardently for the free coinage of silver as was Ohio against it, increased her vote 25.8 per cent in the same election.

It is also said that Minnesota cast 12,100 "fraudulent excess" of votes in the election of 1896, but no attention is called to the fact that Minnesota's vote in 1896 was actually 8.9 per cent less than her own vote in the Presidential election of 1892. Her vote in 1892 was 374,807, and that of 1896 341,539, a falling off of 33,000 votes; but as 107,000 of the votes of 1892 were cast by the Union

Labor party, which afterwards merged with the Populists, no complaint is made of the vote of 1892, which was a gain of 42.1 per cent over that of 1888, while the 1898 vote was a gain of 38.4 per cent over that of 1882.

Illinois increased her vote in 1896 24.9 per cent over 1892, and the charge is made of a "fraudulent excess" of votes amounting to 137,000. Yet no complaint is made over the fact that Mississippi increased her vote 31.9 per cent, or that Florida increased her vote 30.5 per cent in 1896, as compared with 1892, nor the fact that Illinois also gained 25.8 per cent in 1876. The highest percentage of gain of any State in which these charges are made of "fraudulent excess" of votes was in Kentucky, where the gain was 31.1 per cent as compared with 1892, and the "fraudulent excess" charged is 43,300. But no one offers any objection whatever to the fact that Idaho increased her vote in 1896 52.5 per cent as compared with 1892, nor do we hear that Kentucky herself gained 36.1 per cent in the year 1876 and 24.7 per cent in 1888, and also it is not stated that Nebraska gained 50.7 per cent in 1888.

It may be interesting to see some of these figures side by side, as follows:

It will be seen by the above table that if Congress were to enter upon an investigation of the vote in the recent election, it would be well enough for it to inquire into the Democratic States as well as those which gave their electoral votes to McKinley, since in many of them the increase over the last preceding election was very much greater than was the gain in the Republican States in which fraud is charged.

The following tables, prepared with great care, show the percentage of the total vote given to the Republican candidate in each of the last four national elections. By this term is meant the election for President in a Presidential year and members of Congress in the other years named. They will repay a careful study by every student of the political questions of the day and of the disposition of the American voters with reference to the great questions now before them. In the first table is given a full list of the States, alphabetically arranged, showing the percentage of the total vote given to Republican candidates in each of the national elections since and including 1890. In the tables which follow, the States are grouped according to the occupation of their people and their geographical location, the same figures as to percentage of total votes given to Republican candidates being presented.

It is also to be observed that in the footnotes accompanying each table the "percentage of the total vote cast" is given; also the "average number of votes for each elector" and the "percentage of electors for McKinley." It is proper to explain that the term "total vote" relates to the total number of persons above 21 years of age shown by the census of 1890; also that the term "average number of votes for each elector" is intended to draw attention to the fact that in certain sections of the country a much larger number of votes is required to obtain an elector than in other sections. For instance, in the agricultural States there is an average of but 1 elector for 36,371 votes cast, while in the mining States 1 elector is obtained for each 19,741 votes cast. The term "percentage of electors for McKinley" is intended to show the proportion of the total number of electors of each section which was given to the Republican candidate. It will be observed that the agricultural States gave 78 per cent of their electors to McKinley; that the border Southern States gave 100 of their electoral votes to McKinley, and that the manufacturing States also gave all of their electors to the Republican candidate. It is also interesting to observe that in the agricultural and border Southern States, owing to the intense interest felt in the campaign, 95 per cent of the total male population above 21 years of age, as shown in 1890, voted; that in the manufacturing States, where Republican success was practically assured, the vote was but 76 per cent; that in the extreme Southern States, where Democratic success was certain, the vote was but 65 per cent, and in the mining States, where the Democratic ticket was clearly certain of election, the vote was but 64 per cent.

INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, House resolution No. 214 was referred this morning with the amendments of the Senate to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The members of that committee have examined the amendments and think that the resolution as amended by the Senate ought to pass.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations or public spaces in city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1897, etc.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the committee on illumination of the citizens' executive committee for the inaugural ceremonies, March, 1897, to stretch suitable overhead conductors, with sufficient supports, wherever necessary, and in the nearest practicable connection with the present supply of light, for the purpose of effecting the said illumination: Provided, That the said conductors shall not be used for the conveying of electrical currents after March 6, 1897, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the streets and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before March 15, 1897: Provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced, that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public, and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: Provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removing of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That for the purposes of this act the construction of additional underground conduits is specifically prohibited.

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to permit the Western Union Telegraph Company to extend overhead wires into the Pension Building and to such points along the line of parade as shall be deemed by the chief marshal convenient for use in connection with the parade and other inaugural purposes, the said wires to be taken down within ten days after the conclusion of the ceremonies on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1897.

Mr. RICHARDSON (before the reading was concluded). The resolution, with the amendments of the Senate, was read this morning; and unless it is particularly desired, I presume there is no necessity for a rereading.

The resolution and the amendments refer simply to arrangements for the inaugural ceremonies—the policing of the city and the preservation of life and property during the eight or ten days preceding and following those ceremonies. Provision is also made for lighting the Pension Office during the night of the inaugural ball, also for the construction of certain stands on public reservations. All the arrangements are to be under the direction and supervision of the District Commissioners. I think the resolution as amended ought to pass. We are assured by gentlemen in charge of the inaugural ceremonies that there is very great necessity for its passage at once, inasmuch as contracts are being suspended until legislation of this character can be had.

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARTMAN. Does this resolution provide for a separate stand for the convenience of Senators and Representatives and their families?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; it provides that these stands are to be constructed under the direction of the District Commissioners, but it does not provide for any use of them by Members or Senators.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is there any provision for a separate stand for Senators and Representatives?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None that I know of.

Mr. HARTMAN. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to that effect?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, we could not very well amend this bill now. There may be a separate resolution introduced for that purpose, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. HARTMAN. I would not like to interfere with the passage of this resolution, but would be glad if this appropriation were made for the erection of a stand for the convenience of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will introduce a resolution, the committee will give it careful consideration and make prompt report upon it. But this being a House resolution with Senate amendments, my motion is to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask if there is a provision in the resolution that interferes in any way with or disturbs the present controversy between the electric-light companies?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None whatever.

Mr. HEPBURN. Nothing that bears on that question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; nothing for either company. And it provides that this work shall be taken down and removed within ten days after the inauguration.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to make the suggestion, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman, that this resolution provides, as he will find, that for this purpose the construction of any additional underground conduits is expressly prohibited.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then there is no provision that affects or touches this controversy?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; none whatever. I submitted it to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] and have read it carefully myself, and am sure there is no such provision in it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate amendments?

There being no objection, the Senate amendments were considered, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SULPHUR RIVER.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment, and agree to the bill as passed the Senate.

W. P. HEPBURN,
ANDREW PRICE,
Managers on the part of the House.

KNUTE NELSON,
J. H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement furnished by the House conferees is as follows:

The House of Representatives amended S. 1722 by adding the fifth section. This action was undoubtedly the result of inadvertence. The general purpose of the bill was to validate the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River in the State of Arkansas by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company. The bridge has been already completed, and is in daily use. The amendment of the House in the form of a fifth section simply provided for the commencement of the work of construction within one year, and its completion within three years from date of approval. The above amendment is entirely unnecessary, and the committee therefore recommend that the House recede from its amendment and agree to the passage of the Senate bill.

W. P. HEPBURN,
Conferee on the part of the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. This is a bill, Mr. Speaker, to ratify and approve the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, a small stream down in Arkansas. That was the whole purpose of the bill. The bridge had already been constructed, on some authority or assumed authority by the Secretary of War, and the bill of the Senate, to which the conference report applies, was intended to validate that construction. By inadvertence of some kind or by some person, an additional section was added to the bill in the form of an amendment providing, as usual in such bills, that the construction should be begun within one and completed within three years. It was unnecessary, and ought not to have been there. It was an oversight, as the bridge is already constructed, and the amendment of the Senate was to strike that out, in which the committee concurred.

The conference report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair will submit some personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COBB, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HICKS, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CLARDY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CUMMINGS, on account of sickness.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

ELECTION LAWS IN THE DIFFERENT STATES.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 26th of January last I presented a table showing the provisions of the election laws in the different States, which was ordered printed as a document. There are numerous calls for the document, in one instance a call for a large number of copies, and I ask unanimous consent that the document may be reprinted to the number of 500.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BARZILLA C. HUDSON.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2253) for the relief of Barzilla C. Hudson. I will state that a similar bill passed both Houses at the last session.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Barzilla C. Williams, the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter and lot 5 of section 9, township 14 south, range 68 west, sixth principal meridian, in the county of El Paso, Colo.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending order of business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Concurrent or other resolutions are in order.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution instructing the Committee on Pacific Railroads to inquire and report to the Senate whether the executive department has, by existing law, authority to foreclose the Government mortgage or lien on the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific railroads, etc.

Mr. THURSTON addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3247.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope my colleague will be permitted to continue his discussion of the resolutions.

Mr. LODGE. I want to say one word before that is agreed to. I have not pressed the conference report on the immigration bill this morning because I knew the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] desired to speak; nor is it my intention to oppose the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] with the unfinished business. The conference report is in its last stage, and I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the call for the reports of committees, bills, concurrent and other resolutions, etc., I shall ask the Senate to go on with the consideration of the report. I shall call it up as a privileged matter and ask the Senate to proceed with it, in order to reach a decision as soon as possible.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside that my colleague may proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, in order that his colleague may proceed with his remarks.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that had better be done in the morning hour.

Mr. WHITE. Unless the Senator from Nebraska would very much like to continue his remarks now, I suggest that the resolution go over.

Mr. THURSTON. No; I do not care to take up further time this morning.

Mr. WHITE. I think the resolution had better go over, then.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what my colleague wants to do, but it is important that the resolutions should be disposed of. Of course passing them over from morning to morning brings the termination of the present Congress nearer and may make it impossible to do anything with them.

Mr. THURSTON. I should like the morning hour to continue my presentation of this matter.

[Mr. THURSTON's speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.]

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me the matter has already been effectually disposed of so far as the present is concerned, and I think the future will take care of itself.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the resolution goes to the Calendar. Does it not, Mr. President?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed to the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Rhode Island wants to insist on a technicality, I desire to say to him now that he will gain nothing by it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not making——

Mr. ALLEN. So far as I am concerned, I propose to discuss this question, and discuss it thoroughly, when the proper time comes. If I do not discuss it on this resolution, I will discuss it upon a facsimile of it, or upon some bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object to anything, except to taking up the time.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall, as is his right, discuss the resolution at any time he sees fit.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Rhode Island knows there is not the slightest purpose to do anything at the present Congress. Then let it be understood by both sides of the Chamber that nothing is to be done except to pass the appropriation bills. Here is the bankruptcy bill that is in the last stages of consumption. The Nicaraguan Canal bill is about ready to be nailed up and put in its coffin. There is no purpose to determine anything at the present Congress. Now, why not discuss this resolution and let it go to the committee, and let us have the information, so that it can be used at the opening of another session of Congress?

Mr. GEAR. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that as soon as the immigration conference report and the Nicaragua Canal bill and the bankruptcy bill are disposed of, and I give notice now, I am going to call up the bill providing for the settlement of the debts of the Pacific railroads.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the Senator had better fix about the first Monday in December next to call up the bill.

Mr. GEAR. That is a matter of opinion. I am advised by gentlemen in charge of the bankruptcy bill that they will give way at a proper time in the consideration of that measure to allow me to call up the railroad bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not doubt that at all.

Mr. GEAR. I do not think the resolution will be prejudiced by a delay of a day or two, and I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not press it unduly.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the resolutions be passed over, and that they be taken up to-morrow morning during the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLISON. What is the request?

Mr. ALLEN. That the resolutions which have been discussed be passed over until to-morrow morning, to be taken up in the morning hour.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has given notice that he will call up the conference report to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. I have already given notice that I shall to-morrow morning feel it incumbent to call up the conference report on the immigration bill, which is privileged, and which ought to be disposed of. It is in its last stage, and I think we ought to reach a vote on that measure. I am certain the Senator from Nebraska would not mind postponing his remarks in order to give us a chance to finish the immigration bill.

Mr. ALLEN. That does not necessarily interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing when the resolutions come up, if the Senator's bill is so much more important than the resolutions, to give way to him, but I want the resolutions in a shape where they can be disposed of, and where it will not be necessary for me to duplicate them and introduce them over again.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, certainly not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the request of the Senator from Nebraska to the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the request, it is that the resolutions shall retain their place without prejudice.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yesterday offered two amendments to the pending bill. I rise for the purpose of stating that he and I have agreed on the form of those amendments and I accept them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama desire to have the amendments accepted by him read?

Mr. MORGAN. They were read yesterday, except that there is a change in form.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that they be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Insert as additional sections the following:

"SEC. —. That the bonds hereinbefore mentioned shall not be guaranteed, and no money shall be expended in the construction of the canal until a survey has been made by a competent board of engineers, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and a complete plan prepared for the entire work, and such plan shall be approved by the President of the United States.

"SEC. —. That should it appear from the report of said board of engineers that the cost of said canal will be more than $150,000,000, the President shall report the plan to Congress. The bonds herein provided for shall not be guaranteed, and the Government of the United States shall not assume any liability in the construction of said canal unless Congress shall otherwise direct."

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I had proceeded to consider two of the reasons which have been suggested why the United States should undertake alone this work, and I think I satisfactorily showed that the theory that the Government could undertake it as an investment of money for profit is entirely indefensible. I think also the argument against the idea that the canal should be constructed by us as a military auxiliary is entirely satisfactory, and that upon that basis we can not for a moment entertain the proposition.

The third proposition, upon which alone there may rest a seeming force to move our judgment toward this project, that our commercial interests demand it, I partly discussed yesterday, and in the course of my remarks I submitted tables showing the commercial advantages which the committee proffer to the Senate as probable to arise from this waterway, and by their own tables I demonstrated that Great Britain would enjoy five-eighths of the commerce of that canal; perhaps, estimating it more closely, six-eighths or three-fourths; that the United States would enjoy not more than one-fifth by their own exposition of probabilities; and that Germany had about 15 per cent, or very nearly as much as the United States, of interest in its construction.

Now, sir, when we look at those most important facts, does not the question seem a very pertinent one to the Congress of the United States, Why should this nation alone and at its own cost undertake an enterprise in which our interest, by every just measure of it, in comparison with other nations, is so small? Why should we not proffer to the world at large, especially, I mean, to the great commercial countries who send their ships abroad upon the ocean—Germany, France, and particularly England—a readiness on our part to unite with them in such measures as would secure for the world this great communication between the oceans? But why should we not say to them, "You are more interested in it than we, far more; the obligation, so far as it can be a national obligation at all, to create this great work of civilization for the benefit of commerce is an obligation incumbent upon England and Germany as much and more, especially more upon England, than upon the United States?" Why should we do this thing alone from which Great Britain is to derive three times the gain which we can possibly expect?

Sir, even Nicaragua perfectly comprehended this idea and this theory upon which that canal was to be constructed, and carefully stipulated in the articles of this very concession by which we are to undertake, if this bill be adopted, to construct the canal for such a recognition of the interest of the world. Let me read from the second article:

The canal shall be of sufficient dimensions for the free and commodious passage of vessels of the same size as the large steamers used for ocean navigation in Europe and America.

And from Article IV:

The duration of the present privilege shall be for ninety-nine (99) years, to be counted from the day the canal shall be opened to universal traffic.

And then the sixth article, which provides:

The Government of the Republic declares, during the term of this concession, the ports at each extremity of the canal, and the canal itself, from sea to sea, to be neutral, and that consequently the transit through the canal in case of war between two powers or between one or more and Nicaragua shall not be interrupted for such cause; and that merchant vessels and individuals of all nations of the world may freely enter the ports and pass through the canal without molestation or detention.

In general, all vessels may pass through the canal freely, without distinction, exclusion, or preference of persons or nationality, provided they pay the dues and observe the regulations established by the grantee company for the use of the said canal and its dependencies. The transit of foreign troops and vessels of war will be subjected to the prescriptions relating to the same established by treaties between Nicaragua and other powers or by international law. But entrance to the canal will be rigorously prohibited to vessels of war of such powers as may be at war with Nicaragua or with any other of the Central American Republics.

Nicaragua will endeavor to obtain from the powers that are to guarantee the neutrality that in the treaties that shall be made for that purpose they shall agree also to guarantee a zone of land parallel to the canal and also a maritime zone in both oceans, the dimensions of which will be determined in such treaties.

Those three articles of the concession demonstrate that Nicaragua contemplated that this company, which had not then been chartered by the United States, but which was a company dealing directly with the State of Nicaragua and in no manner under liability, as it was thought, to become the creature of any foreign government, against which they expressly stipulated, should procure subscriptions to its stock in the capitals of the world, manifesting as perfectly as words can the clear view of that country that the obligation to build this canal, growing out of the advantages which would ensue to commerce from it, was an obligation which rested not on any one country, but upon those countries and peoples of the world whose commerce is to derive the advantages which may be expected to ensue from it.

Why, I say, sir, should the United States, in the face of these facts, that its commercial interest is not more than one-fifth—not one-fifth—that of this and the other nations, England, Germany, and France, in this canal—why should the United States undertake alone all the burden and charge of the enterprise? For what reason should we go forth quixotically to do the work of the world in the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal?

Sir, we have heard one answer to this idea, and but one. There has been a deft phrase proffered to the Senate, and often falling from the lips of the distinguished and able chairman of the special committee—a sentence which, I think, was first delivered to Congress over the signature of President Hayes—that "the policy of this country is a canal under American control." Unless that be a sound declaration, I have never heard any reason given to warrant this extravagant volunteering on the part of the United States to do a work only for the benefit of other commercial nations who must derive far more gain from it than we.

It is most important, then, that we examine this alleged policy of the United States. I declare, sir, in the beginning that the assertion of policy is untrue as matter of history; it is unsound in statesmanship or common sense. There is no such American policy; there never has been.

Sir, we are apt in our self-sufficiency, casting a view over some project which captivates the mind, to fancy that our vision and understanding far outstrip the men who have lived before us in the world, and it would often seem when this matter has been under debate as if there never had been before anybody to whom we could allow compass of mind or imagination adequate to an understanding of this question; but if we look into the records of the past, we shall find that the subject of an isthmian canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans is no novelty; we shall find that minds as able as any this country ever produced have grasped it with perfect understanding: and I think it will be easy to demonstrate that, so far from the great men of this country having ever considered such a policy as this to be the true policy of America, they took a far more generous, a far wider, and broader view; and I propose to ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments to some of the points of history in respect to this important question.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TURPIE. I suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate present in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, after the successful revolt of the Spanish colonies on this continent from their mother country and the establishment of a number of new republics, it will be remembered by Senators that there was an invitation issued by the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and Central America to the United States, among others, to join in a congress to be held in 1826 at Panama, to consider together the great interests of the Western World under the guidance of liberty. The United States accepted that invitation, as it had from the beginning of their movement toward independence testified the liveliest sympathy in their purposes and expectations; and an American, who, whatever may have been the differences and political controversies in his time, will now be recognized as entitled to a degree unsurpassed by any other of our illustrious countrymen to the name of a great American,

Henry Clay, was our Secretary of State. He said then, in his instructions to the plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that congress at Panama, some things upon the subject of an isthmian canal that was but one of the possible topics of debate in that approaching congress, and the instructions which he gave to the envoys covered a great stretch of ground of a different character. I shall read, however, a few words from what he said to those ministers in respect to this possible topic of consideration, an isthmian canal. I read from those instructions as they are found in the Appendix to the fifth volume of the Congressional Debates, on page 47:

A cut or canal for purposes of navigation, somewhere through the isthmus that connects the two Americas, to unite the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, will form a proper subject of consideration at the Congress. That object, if it should ever be accomplished, will be interesting, in a greater or less degree, to all parts of the world. But to this continent will probably accrue the largest amount of benefit from its execution; and to Colombia, Mexico, the Central Republic, Peru, and the United States, more than to any other of the American nations. What is to redound to the advantage of all America should be effected by common means and united exertions, and should not be left to the separate and unassisted efforts of any one power.

Then, after some further discussion, he proceeds to this point, to which I particularly invite attention—the point of the American policy:

If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls. What is most desirable at present is to possess the data necessary to form a correct judgment of the practicability and the probable expense of the undertaking on the routes which offer the greatest facilities.

Thus, in effect, in what is the earliest official deliverance of this country on this subject, the true policy of the United States was foreshadowed that a canal joining those two oceans must necessarily be not the exclusive property or devoted to the exclusive use of any power, but be rightfully enjoyed by the commerce of all the world.

A few years afterwards, in 1835, the subject came up for debate in this Senate what was the true policy of the United States in respect to such a canal, and enjoyed discussion by such men as Daniel Webster, John Forsyth, and John M. Clayton, and the Senate came to a resolution upon it. I will read that resolution. On the 3d of March, 1835, in executive session:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

Thus, upon debate in this body, the ideas of Mr. Clay as Secretary of State found acceptance here, and the policy of this country was declared that as it was for all nations, so should all nations take part by common accord and universal agreement in guaranteeing forever the use of that waterway to mankind.

I have heard the distinguished chairman of the special committee speak also as if by the card of the sentiments of another illustrious American, Andrew Jackson, as if he were one who would have most readily put away anything but the idea of exclusiveness. I shall next draw your attention to his opinions on that subject as they were stated to the Senate by Mr. Clayton in 1853. I read from a speech by that great Senator which was delivered in the special session of the Senate in the Thirty-second Congress. It is found in the Appendix to volume 27 of the Globe, page 251. Mr. Clayton says:

I introduced the resolution—

Which I have read—

just eighteen years ago last Friday, and on the next day Congress adjourned, and John Forsyth entered upon the duties of Secretary of State, under the Administration of President Jackson. The suggestion contained in the resolution met with a warm and hearty approval from the President, and on the 1st day of May, 1835, Charles Biddle was charged with the duty of making inquiries, with a view to enable the Executive to comply with it. Mr. Forsyth's instructions to Mr. Biddle directed him to proceed by the most direct route to Lake Nicaragua, to explore the contemplated communication by canal or railroad in that quarter, for which purpose every facility was granted to Mr. Biddle. He was afterwards directed to proceed to examine the Panama route and such other points on the Atlantic side of the isthmus as would probably be fixed on for the termination of a road. I was anxious at the time that William Ratcliff, the former consul at Chagres, who had devoted much of his life to the examination of the subject, should receive the appointment. But, unfortunately, he was no politician. Mr. Biddle disobeyed his instructions—never visited Nicaragua; and after having procured from the Government of New Granada an exclusive grant of the right of way across the Isthmus of Panama, vesting in citizens of the United States the monopoly of the route, in direct opposition to the resolution of the Senate, he returned home, and then for the first time fully informed Mr. Forsyth that it "appeared to him unnecessary at present to enter into negotiations with foreign nations upon the subject."

His idea of an exclusive grant to our citizens of the right of way was in accordance with the opinion of Mr. Hise, subsequently appointed by Mr. Polk. Both negotiated for a monopoly of the passage in our own citizens. But there was this difference between them: That the grant negotiated by Mr. Biddle provided that two-thirds of the stock created by it should be "the property of Charles Biddle and such citizens of the United States as he might associate with him, the office of the company to be in Philadelphia, and all installments to be paid there, and the number of directors to be in the same proportion as the quantity of stock." President Jackson was highly displeased with the result; and Mr. Forsyth, on the 23d of September, 1836, immediately after ascertaining the facts, in a dispatch to Robert B. McAfee, our chargé d'affaires at Bogota, disavowed and censured the whole proceeding, and directed him "to disclaim all connection with the project on the part of this Government, to prevent any misunderstanding with the Government of New Granada." The whole object of the Senate and the President was thus frustrated by the incompetency of the agent. President Jackson shortly after went out of office.

So much for the opinions of that great American on the question of the alleged policy of the United States of exclusive control of the canal.

The subject came up again in Congress in 1839, in the House of Representatives, and I read from Report No. 322, made at the third session of the Twenty-fifth Congress by Mr. Mercer, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, upon the subject of a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But to spare the time of the Senate, after calling attention to the report, I shall read only the resolution which they proposed to the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with those the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus; and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations, on the payment of reasonable tolls.

Thus stood the declaration of policy by the foreign office and the two Houses so far as any had been made until the time when a treaty was made between this country and Granada in 1847, and the question of the true American policy here presented was then directly involved in that convention; and that convention, as is well known, recognized and proceeded upon the idea of the neutrality to all mankind of any route of traffic upon the Isthmus.

Sir, I wish to read the message of the President of the United States submitting that treaty to the Senate, in order that it may be seen how perfectly this question of policy was then comprehended.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date, if you please?

Mr. VILAS. The 10th of February, 1847.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, for their advice with regard to its ratification, "A general treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, between the United States of America and the Republic of New Granada," concluded at Bogota on the 12th of December last, by Benjamin A. Bidlack, chargé d'affaires of the United States, on their part, and by Manuel Maria Mallarino, secretary of state and foreign relations, on the part of that Republic.

It will be perceived by the thirty-fifth article of this treaty that New Granada proposes to guarantee to the Government and citizens of the United States the right of passage across the Isthmus of Panama, over the natural roads and over any canal or railroad which may be constructed to unite the two seas, on condition that the United States shall make a similar guaranty to New Granada of the neutrality of this portion of her territory and her sovereignty over the same.

The reasons which caused the insertion of this important stipulation in the treaty will be fully made known to the Senate by the accompanying documents. From these it will appear that our chargé d'affaires acted in this particular upon his own responsibility and without instructions. Under such circumstances it became my duty to decide whether I would submit the treaty to the Senate; and after mature consideration I have determined to adopt this course.

The importance of the concession to the commercial and political interests of the United States can not easily be overrated. The route by the Isthmus of Panama is the shortest between the two oceans; and from the information herewith communicated, it would seem to be the most practicable for a railroad or canal.

The vast advantages to our commerce which would result from such a communication, not only with the west coast of America, but with Asia and the islands of the Pacific, are too obvious to require any detail. Such a passage would relieve us from a long and dangerous navigation of more than 9,000 miles around Cape Horn and render our communication with our own possessions on the northwest coast of America comparatively easy and speedy.

The communication across the Isthmus has attracted the attention of the Government of the United States ever since the independence of the South American Republics. On the 3d of March, 1835, a resolution passed the Senate in the following words:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America; and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work."

No person can be more deeply sensible than myself of the danger of entangling alliances with any foreign nation. That we should avoid such alliances has become a maxim of our policy, consecrated by the most venerated names which adorn our history, and sanctioned by the unanimous voice of the American people. Our own experience has taught us the wisdom of this maxim in the only instance—that of the guaranty to France of her American possessions—in which we have ever entered into such an alliance. If, therefore, the very peculiar circumstances of the present case do not greatly impair, if not altogether destroy, the force of this objection, then we ought not to enter into the stipulation, whatever may be its advantages. The general considerations which have induced me to transmit the treaty to the Senate, for their advice, may be summed up in the following particulars:

1. The treaty does not propose to guarantee a territory to a foreign nation in which the United States will have no common interest with that nation.

On the contrary, we are more deeply and directly interested in the subject of this guaranty than New Granada herself or any other country.

2. The guaranty does not extend to the territories of New Granada generally, but is confined to the single province of the Isthmus of Panama, where we shall acquire by the treaty a common and coextensive right of passage with herself.

3. It will constitute no alliance for any political object, but for a purely commercial purpose, in which all the navigating nations of the world have a common interest.

4. In entering into the mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution, to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the isthmus. If the United States, as the chief of the American nations, should first become a party to this guaranty, it can not be doubted—indeed, it is confidently expected by the Government of New Granada—that similar guaranties will be given to that Republic by Great Britain and France. Should the proposition thus tendered be rejected, we may deprive the United States of the just influence which its acceptance might secure to them, and confer the glory and benefits of being first among the nations in concluding such an arrangement upon the Government either of Great Britain or France. That either of these Governments would embrace the offer can not well be doubted, because there does not appear to be any other effectual means of securing to all nations the advantages of this important passage but the guaranty of great commercial powers that the isthmus shall be neutral territory. The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

Besides, such a guaranty is almost indispensable to the construction of a railroad or canal across the territory. Neither sovereign states nor individuals would expend their capital in the construction of the expensive works without some such security for their investments.

The guaranty of the sovereignty of New Granada over the isthmus is a natural consequence of the guaranty of this neutrality, and there does not seem to be any other practicable mode of securing neutrality of this territory. New Granada would not consent to yield up this province in order that it might become a neutral state; and if she could, it is not sufficiently populous or wealthy to establish and maintain an independent sovereignty. But a civil government must exist there, in order to protect the works which shall be constructed. New Granada is a power which will not excite the jealousy of any nation. If Great Britain, France, or the United States held the sovereignty over the isthmus, other nations might apprehend that, in case of war, the Government would close up the passage against the enemy; but no such fears can ever be entertained in regard to New Granada.

The vote on that treaty was 29 for ratification to but 7 opposed.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. TURPIE. I have been very much interested with the statement of the research which the Senator from Wisconsin has made into the international arrangements regarding an isthmian canal, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin, who has devoted so much time and ability to the research, will still continue in it. I feel also extreme anxiety that the friends of the pending measure should have the opportunity of hearing the honorable Senator upon that subject. I therefore suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Lindsay,	Pugh,
Allen,	Daniel,	Lodge,	Roach,
Bacon,	Faulkner,	McBride,	Sewell,
Baker,	Gallinger,	McMillin,	Sherman,
Bate,	Gordon,	Martin,	Smith,
Blackburn,	Gray,	Mills,	Stewart,
Blanchard,	Hale,	Morgan,	Thurston,
Brice,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Tillman.
Brown,	Hill,	Murphy,	Turpie,
Burrows,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Vilas.
Cameron,	Irby,	Pasco,	Walthall,
Carter,	Jones, Ark.	Peffer,	Wilson.
Chilton,	Jones, Nev.	Perkins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. VILAS. That treaty has remained in force from that day to this, and under it the United States have guaranteed Granada in the integrity of her territory. Granada has since taken a new form and is now embraced within the United States of Colombia, but the obligation resulting from the adoption of that policy is as it was then agreed to be.

We have seen how, from the very first mention of this canal in the foreign office, the real policy and the true policy of the United States was declared by the greatest Americans. At last, sir, when one of them occupied the post of Secretary of State, there arose a necessity for a particular consideration of what course should be taken by the United States with reference to the possible claims of England, and then the ideas of the resolution of the Senate were carried into execution, and the policy of the United States in respect to an isthmian canal was enacted by the treaty making power of the United States into the paramount law of this land by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850.

When we talk of what is the policy of the United States, why do we not turn at once to that explicit written law which is obligatory upon this country not only as an engagement with a great foreign nation, but as the law of the land, binding upon our citizens, a written expression of agreement internationally and of law here which has never been abrogated, and which in my opinion is just as much in force to-day as it was on the day when ratifications were exchanged?

Let me read what the Governments of the United States and Great Britain settled by that treaty as declaratory, historically and legally, of the policy of the United States upon the point under discussion:

ARTICLE I.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any port of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

Then observe Article III:

In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal and their property used or to be used for that object shall be protected, from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

And the fourth article:

The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any state, states, or governments, possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such states or governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

And particularly observe Article VI, which I wish to add at this point:

The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every state with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other states may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American states as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the states or governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TURPIE. Before the honorable Senator leaves the text of the treaty I should like to inquire of him the date of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. VILAS. It is April 19, 1850.

Mr. TURPIE. I should like also to inquire of the honorable Senator whether the treaty does not contain a limitation of the time.

Mr. VILAS. None whatever, and I shall by and by call attention to that with particularity.

Mr. TURPIE. It has been represented here that it had a limitation.

Mr. VILAS. I shall call attention to that presently.

When we are talking of an American policy, let us remember that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was the direct and natural consummation of every consideration of the question of policy which had ever preceded it and had found expression in Congress or with any of the great officials of the United States. And, sir, that treaty was eagerly ratified by the Senate of the United States. When the distinguished and honorable chairman of the special committee again recapitulates to us the names of the persons of character and distinction in this country who are connected with the project of the Maritime Canal Company, let me ask him to recall the names of the men who sat in this Senate when that policy of the United States was declared and enacted into law. Here were then such Americans as Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Stephen A. Douglas, Dickinson and Seward from New York, Benton from Missouri, Salmon P. Chase and Thomas Ewing of Ohio, Houston of Texas, Cass of Michigan, Hunter and Mason of Virginia, Clemens and King from Alabama, Hannibal Hamlin of Maine, Hale of New Hampshire, and Dayton of New Jersey. No Senate that ever convened had probably greater or even so great an average of illustrious, able, and powerful men; none were ever better fitted to declare what true Americanism should be in our treatment of other countries.

Sir, this question was not misunderstood. We do not come to its consideration as men who have had opened to our vision a scope of perception, and who possess a power of understanding so much greater than was enjoyed by our fathers. It was thoroughly comprehended; it was distinctly looked in the face; and this agreement was made in order that there might be established an American policy which should contemplate, as America ought always to contemplate, with generous grasp, the fraternity of interests of all mankind.

Let me note on the question of policy, upon this particular question of exclusiveness or neutrality, Article II, which I did not read:

Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

Note, sir, that in that engagement for neutrality the most advanced ideas which have since found as concerns the Suez Canal acceptance from all the great powers of the earth but Russia were incorporated, namely, that even though Great Britain and the United States were at war, their vessels of war should there pass to and fro at peace, although the moment they were loosed from the protected zone their guns might open upon one another in hostile conflict.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas having suggested the want of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chandler,	Jones, Ark.	Pasco,
Bacon,	Chilton,	Jones, Nev.	Peffer,
Bate,	Cullom,	Lindsay,	Perkins,
Berry,	Daniel,	McBride,	Roach,
Blackburn,	Davis,	McMillan,	Sewell,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I wish next to emphasize the clearness with which this policy was understood and foreseen by drawing attention to the fifth article of that treaty:

The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government, if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles.

So, in Article VIII they declare the general principle:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other state which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

There stands not only our solemn international contract; there stands the law, obligatory upon us as well as upon other citizens of the United States. It may be, sir (as I intimated in the discussion the other day might be one of the conceivable theories upon which we were to crawl into the hide of this corporation instead of going out in our own sovereign capacity), that Great Britain will wink at our being there as a corporation instead of a sovereignty, under the dominion of Nicaragua, if we can put ourselves into that humiliating attitude; and recognizing, as she can not help but recognize, the enormous superiority of advantages which will accrue to her from the construction of this canal over what the United States may receive, she may permit us to spend our money and build this great work for mankind without objection or protest.

Sir, I doubt it. I am not one of those who believe that that would be her course. She has had yet no opportunity to protest. Great Britain perfectly understands that no stage of progress has yet been reached in the consideration of this subject by the United States which would warrant her foreign office in saying to us, "You are going beyond your engagement." She will wait until we shall have resolved upon, perhaps begun, a step in contravention of the obligation we have assumed to her. I should expect that at that time she will protest, and, sir, when she protests, we shall heed it. Whatever we may enact into law at the solicitation of the Maritime Canal Company for their relief, when our great engagement with England is brought home to us, we shall respect it. The people of this country will not break their solemn promise to any nation on earth.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VILAS. Assuredly; with pleasure.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator, as he is commenting upon the treaty, whether he thinks that the Democratic platform adopted in 1856 is in violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Mr. PUGH. I hope my colleague will read it.

Mr. MORGAN. I will read only two clauses of it:

2. Resolved, That our geographical and political position with reference to the other states of this continent, no less than the interest of our commerce and the development of our growing power, requires that we should hold as sacred the principles involved in the Monroe doctrine; their bearing and import admit of no misconstruction; they should be applied with unbending rigidity.

3. Resolved, That the great highway which nature, as well as the assent of the States most immediately interested in its maintenance, has marked out for a free communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans constitutes one of the most important achievements realized by the spirit of modern times and the unconquerable energy of our people. That result should be secured by a timely and efficient exertion of the control which we have the right to claim over it, and no power on earth should be suffered to impede or clog its progress by any interference with the relations it may suit our policy to establish between our Government and the governments of the states within whose dominions it lies. We can under no circumstance surrender our preponderance in the adjustment of all questions arising out of it.

I merely wanted to inquire whether the Senator thought that exposition of Democratic doctrine made in 1856 was in conflict with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Mr. VILAS. The sentiment is in contravention of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; it is not Democratic sentiment, nor any part of the policy of the Democratic party. It is not a breach, as the Senator first asked me, of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, for the reason that every idle expression introduced into party platforms or adopted by boards of trade does not infringe our solemn obligations with foreign nations.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator fails to remember that the platform on which Mr. Cleveland was first nominated for the Presidency had a similar provision in it in favor of the building of the Nicaraguan Canal, and under that platform the Senator took office at the hands of the Democratic party.

Mr. VILAS. I have participated in making those platforms, and I know as well as many another man in this Chamber that such resolutions as those in regard to the Nicaraguan Canal are put in after nights have been spent in wrestling over great questions which have caused differences among the zealous men of a party, and are put in without the least consideration. To illustrate how utterly wanting in political significance they are, I will call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Alabama to the fact that the Republican convention put such a provision into their platform also, under similar circumstances and at like solicitation, most probably of agents or somebody scheming to press upon the Congress of the United States in the end a subsidy for their benefit. They are utterly without binding obligation upon the persons who vote for the candidates of the party, who follow its banner and profess its general principles, and they are utterly without significance as to our relations with foreign countries.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I am glad that I never was a member of one of those conventions.

Mr. VILAS. Well, Mr. President, perhaps if the Senator had been a member of a convention and had sat sometimes for forty-eight hours in continual wrestling upon the committee on resolutions until his strength was nearly gone, he would understand how much easier it is in the dawning light of morning to let a Nicaraguan Canal resolution go in than to fight any longer upon trivialities.

Mr. MORGAN. I would still hope I should come out of that convention an honest man.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator from Alabama does not for a moment suppose that anybody would impute to him a probable change of character by going to a convention, or that any apprehension he might lose it is the reason that he has never been a member.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my friend from Wisconsin if in his experience he has not sometimes helped to nominate a candidate for the Presidency in the same way?

Mr. VILAS. Never, to my knowledge. Candidates are sometimes nominated under excitement, but in no convention in which I ever participated was a candidate nominated whom I did not cordially support and favor, except one.

Now, sir, suppose we shall proceed to construct that canal—and I have pointed out carefully in the beginning that the proposal of this bill is that the United States shall do the entire business—suppose when we do enact it into law—if that monstrous thing were ever to happen—that Great Britain should say to us, "We hold your solemn covenant that neither of us will ever obtain or maintain any exclusive control, that neither shall ever put a fortification on that coast, that we shall join together that this canal shall be open to our ships of war as well as yours, even though it is with you we are engaged in war,"—if she points out to us the numerous particulars in which our separate undertaking would be a violation of this treaty, with what answer shall she be answered?

Sir, this question stares us in the face; it has lain before this project all the time, and the committee which first reported in 1891 a bill looking to the United States coming into such relations to this canal company, though in many respects a different bill from this, undertook to deal with this question. They undertook to tell us why the United States might break both the letter and the spirit of her solemn engagement; and what were the reasons? I will not do the committee the injustice to even state them myself, but will give them and the Senate the benefit of their exact language in presenting them. Their first reason is that the treaty was obsolete, or, as it should be interpreted, not now, in their opinion, agreeable to our interests. Here is their language:

> We think it can be justly affirmed that the convention of 1850 has become obsolete, for the convention was based upon the idea of an immediate prosecution of the enterprise of creating this great international water highway, and that neither Government would be found, so far as it regarded the particular question, apart from other considerations, to consider its stipulations as longer binding.
> Not only this consideration is to be taken into view, for the course of events in the enterprise and operations of nations has changed entirely the grand commercial situation of the world. The Suez Canal has been constructed, and the Government of Great Britain has become in substance and effect its dominant and controlling proprietor, thus securing to that Government in a very large degree the control of the east and west commerce of the world between the southern and eastern shores of Asia and the whole of Europe, and to a considerable degree the eastern shores of the United States and the other American Republics.
> We think it may be safely affirmed that had the Government of Great Britain, in 1850, been in possession of the Suez Canal, the United States would never have consented that any canal across the American isthmus should be under the joint control of Great Britain and the United States or under any other European control. In this respect, therefore, the immediate declarations and engagements of 1850 between the two Governments in regard to an isthmian canal have become entirely inapplicable, and justly entitle the United States to give its separate aid and encouragement to the construction of such a canal.

That is the proposition, that it has become obsolete, because the particular enterprise which it then had in view has failed. It will be observed that, instead of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty mentioning any particular enterprise, it took great pains to avoid the mention of a particular enterprise, and it begins by declaring in the preliminary clause:

> The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by the way of the river San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, etc.

Then follow the articles. The first article is that neither the one nor the other Government will ever obtain or maintain for itself, etc., agreeing that neither will ever erect, etc., using like words from the beginning to the end of that treaty—and I need not spend more time to point them out—to testify the solemn purpose of both those Governments to fix forever, so long as their good faith could be relied upon to observe and execute their engagements, the absolute neutrality of that canal. For us to pretend that any agreement becomes obsolete for the reason that our interests change, when the terms of that engagement were that it should abide forever, without our taking any steps to denounce that treaty or bring it to any termination within our power, is simply to say that a treaty is binding upon us when we conceive that its provisions are pleasant and agreeable and favorable, and loses its obligation whenever our interests cease to follow. That is the theory of the obsoleteness which the committee maintains of this obligation of the agreement which we have entered into with Great Britain.

Let me illustrate by another thing touching that point the observation I made a little while ago, that it often transpires that our wisdom is not nearly so great as in our self-sufficiency it may appear to us to be; for, so far from its being true that the United States has now for the first time observed a new condition of things in respect to the Suez Canal, I will show to the Senate that long before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was enacted the entire contemplation of the Suez Canal had been laid before our Government in one of the ablest dispatches that ever came into the office of the Secretary of State—the dispatch of Mr. Wheaton in 1845. I can not justly claim the time of the Senate to read the entire dispatch, but I will take occasion to say that if any Senator will snatch from the laborious duties that press upon him time enough to peruse that document, he will find high gratification in observing that not only was the isthmian canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans then under consideration, with a full perception of its character and its influences, but so also was the Suez Canal, and both were taken into view together. It was no new thing subsequently turned out upon the world to alter our relations with Great Britain under our covenant with her, as the committee seem to think.

I will just read a few words from the beginning of that dispatch. It is one of the most interesting discussions of the whole subject of canals from almost the beginning of time, and especially as to their political effects and relations, which has ever fallen under my eye, and does infinite credit to the intelligence and ability of that long-deceased minister to Berlin. He writes from Berlin December 17, 1845, to Mr. Buchanan, then Secretary of State, as follows:

> SIR: The application of steam power to facilitate the social and commercial intercourse between the different quarters of the globe has recently acquired a vastly increased importance, as connected with other great changes which may certainly be anticipated as about to take place in respect to the channels of that intercourse. The object of this dispatch is to present to the Department some views which have occurred to me respecting this subject as being of paramount importance to the commercial and political interests of the United States, and to the future prospects of human improvement in every quarter of the globe.
> The principal revolutions which are believed to be impending in the communications between the continents of the Old and the New World are the following:
> First. The reopening of the ancient water communication between Europe and the East Indies by Egypt and the Red Sea, which must inevitably result either from the permanent establishment of the new Mohammedan dynasty, founded on the banks of the Nile, or from the future colonization of Egypt by some European nation.
> Second. The opening a new route from the United and Europe to the East Indies by the construction of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, across some part of the isthmus which connects the two continents of North and South America.
> The improvement of both these communications by the above-mentioned means would encircle the globe with a continued line of navigation, carried on by steam power, throughout the Northern Hemisphere, between the equator and the parallel of the fortieth degree of north latitude, thus avoiding, in the passage both from west to east and from east to west, the immense detour caused by the projection of the two great promontories by which the continents of Africa and America are terminated in the Southern Hemisphere. The vast importance of both these routes to the world in general is self-evident, and the peculiar importance of the second to the United States in particular will not be in any degree diminished by the increased facilities which the reconstruction of the ancient water communications between the Red Sea and Mediterranean would give to the commercial intercourse between Europe and Asia.

Sir, that is but a step into that interesting dispatch which I shall not take the time of the Senate further to read; but I submit it shows at once that this idea which seems to be almost flippantly put into this report, that because Great Britain has since, as this report mistakenly says, become the controller of the Suez Canal, therefore the interests of the United States no longer run in accordance with the engagement which was then made. That engagement was made with this dispatch of Mr. Wheaton in the office of the Secretary of State; it was made by Mr. Clayton, who in his speech in the Senate spoke in high terms of that dispatch of Mr. Wheaton, who knew all the interesting information which it contained, and the broad-minded, statesmanlike views in regard to the water communications of the earth which it set forth.

But the proposition of fact upon which the committee based the theory that our interests have become so different from what they were when we made the treaty, therefore we can call it obsolete, is a mistake. The distinguished chairman of the special committee himself is aware of the fact that it is a mistake. Instead of Great Britain owning a majority of the stock of the Suez Canal, she owns but one-fifth of it, and though of all the nations of the earth the greatest in interest in that canal, her contribution of money to its construction was but by the purchase of one-fifth of the stock after the canal was constructed.

She did another thing, the same thing that she has done with the United States with reference to the isthmian canal. She guaranteed forever the neutrality of it, as I shall presently show, and thus, by that fact, this theory of obsoleteness, which the committee proffers as a reason for disregard of our engagements, that by express terms was to last forever is entirely done away with; for if that canal is as much open to us as to England; if England has no rights there which any other nation on earth, our own as others, may not enjoy; if no ship of hers has even precedence of advantage of ours in those waters, by what right can we say that we shall disregard our engagement that the same thing shall be true of the isthmian canal when it shall have been constructed?

Sir, let us look at the second reason proffered by the committee as to why the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be regarded as no longer obligatory; and I read again from the language of the committee in order that there may be no misconception.

Mr. MORGAN. From what report does the Senator read?

Mr. VILAS. I am reading from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations made on the 10th of January, 1891; renewed in the Fifty-second Congress on the 22d of December, 1892; and, if I am not mistaken, appended to some report which the distinguished chairman of the select committee has at some time made, but I do not say that I am right in respect to that.

Mr. MORGAN. The report of the committee which is now in charge of the bill does not go upon the ground which the Senator states, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is obsolete, but that both Great Britain and the United States are estopped by the fact that they each have a treaty from Nicaragua in identical terms authorizing the construction of this canal.

Mr. VILAS. Can the Senator point that out in any of his reports?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; the last report contains quite an extensive argument upon that proposition.

Mr. VILAS. I will deal with this other argument now, for this was the one the Committee on Foreign Relations put forward as their best argument why the Clayton-Bulwer treaty might be disregarded.

Mr. MORGAN. That report was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. VILAS. Well, it was the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations submitted by the Senator from Ohio as chairman of that committee, I believe.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the Senator from Ohio would adhere to it yet. I do not know.

Mr. VILAS. Then it is necessary to discuss this reason, which I am about to do. I am very glad, however, and I thank the Senator from Alabama for his courteous acknowledgment that the argument which I have made in respect to the point that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is obsolete seems to have force in his mind, because he says he has not put any reason for a disregard of it upon that basis.

The next reason given by the Committee on Foreign Relations is:

> One of the provisions of the convention of 1850 most important to the United States and to the preservation of the republican governments on this continent was that which declared that neither party to the convention should "occupy or fortify or colonize or assume to exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."
> At that time the "settlement" of British subjects, as it was called, at the Belize, on the coast of Central America, was of the smallest dimensions, and had no substance or form of a territorial dominion. British woodcutters were there under an ancient Spanish license of timber cutting, and nothing more. These settlers in a country not belonging to the British Crown had, off and on, attempted to form a kind of local government for preserving order among themselves, and, after going through various phases, had reached a point, in 1850, of some local magistrates and an imperial superintendent, merely and clearly for the purpose of preserving internal order among the English adventurers engaged in the lumber trade in that foreign country.
> This was substantially the condition of things when the convention of 1850 was entered into.

Now, observe the point upon which they hold the treaty invalid:

> The next step taken, after the convention of 1850, was in 1853—

Only three years—

> when a legislative assembly was constituted to manage the affairs of the settlement. This was followed by a convention between Great Britain and Guatemala in 1859 for the establishment of the boundaries between what the treaty chose to call "Her Britannic Majesty's settlement and possessions in the bay of Honduras" and the territories of Guatemala. The country, or the largest part of it, belonged to Guatemala as the successor to all the sovereign territorial rights of Spain in that region; but by this treaty that which was before a licensed industrial establishment became instantly a possession of the British Crown.
> The settlement government continued until 1862, when the settlement was declared a colony of the British Crown and a regular colonial establishment was set on foot; and so from that time to this the form and substance of a regular colonial government as a part of Her Majesty's dominions has continued. It is understood that its geographical dominion has been vastly enlarged from the licensed wood-cutting limitations and boundaries that existed in 1850. All this has taken place systematically and persistently, notwithstanding the declaration of Her Majesty's Government that it should not "colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over * * * the Mosquito Coast or any part of Central America."
> If these proceedings of Her Majesty's Government, in respect of one of the most important subjects of the convention and in absolute opposition to it, do not discharge the United States from all and every of their declarations and engagements stated in that convention, it is impossible to conceive what could.
> In view of all these considerations, the committee is of opinion that the United States is at present under no obligation, measured either by the terms of the convention, the principles of public law, or good morals, to refrain from promoting, in any way that it may deem best for its just interests, the construction of this canal, without regard to anything contained in the convention of 1850.

That, sir, is the statement, and the whole of it, in the words of the committee. It consists simply in this, that in 1853 Great Britain broke her engagement that she would not colonize in Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and the Mosquito Coast, or Central America. Suppose she did break it; that is to say, that she did not keep the engagement on her part. What, then, was our right? Is there any person read in international law who will say that that alone avoided the treaty? Sir, it gave us the right of electing to avoid it. If it were all true—and I will presently show that there is not a particle of foundation for it—as stated in that report, then it invested this Government only with the right to avoid the treaty. It became voidable at our election, not void. We had still a right to say, "This treaty is obligatory, and we hold you to account for this breach of it and every other breach which you may hereafter make." That is the doctrine and principle of international law which governs a question of the kind.

But, sir, was there any violation by Great Britain? Let me call your attention first to the fact that directly after that treaty was made, when the two plenipotentiaries were to exchange ratifications of it, they exchanged notes with one another lest there should be misunderstanding on this very point, and Sir Henry L. Bulwer made this declaration at the Department of State June 29, 1850, prior to the exchange of ratifications:

> In proceeding to the exchange of the ratifications of the convention, signed at Washington on the 19th of April, 1850, between Her Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, relative to the establishment of a communication by ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans:
> The undersigned, Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary, has received Her Majesty's instructions to declare that Her Majesty does not understand the engagements of that convention to apply to Her Majesty's settlement at Honduras, or to its dependencies.
> Her Majesty's ratification of the said convention is exchanged under the explicit declaration above mentioned.
> Done at Washington the 29th day of June, 1850.
> H. L. BULWER.

Upon it was written:

> The within declaration of Sir H. L. Bulwer was received by me on the 29th day of June, 1850. In reply, I wrote him my note of the 4th of July, acknowledging that I understood British Honduras was not embraced in the treaty of the 19th day of April last, but at the same time carefully declining to affirm or deny the British title in their settlement or its alleged dependencies. After signing my note last night, I delivered it to Sir Henry, and we immediately proceeded, without any further or other action, to exchange the ratifications of said treaty. [The blank in the declaration was never filled up.] The consent of the Senate to the declaration was not required, and the treaty was ratified as it stood when it was made.
> JOHN M. CLAYTON.

Mr. Clayton was then Secretary of State.

Let me show in one word, without stopping to go into elaborate argument, that the reason why the British occupation of Balize or Honduras was not within the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as understood by either of those plenipotentiaries who negotiated it, is that at that time Balize was not a part of Central America, and nobody pretends that it is on the Mosquito Coast. It was neither Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Mosquito Coast, nor a part of Central America. In that speech of Mr. Clayton, which he made in 1853, and to which I acknowledge my indebtedness for much of the information I have mentioned here, Mr. Clayton demonstrates by various evidence in the completest manner that the British Honduras was no part of Central America.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if the exchange of opinions by the plenipotentiaries was communicated to the Senate before the action of the Senate?

Mr. VILAS. As I have said, it was not. They were simply notes expressive of the understanding of the two plenipotentiaries that the British Honduras was not within the terms of the treaty.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that. Of course it is a very important and grave document; but I wish to know whether or not the Senate was aware of that understanding. Is there anything to show that the Senate participated in the understanding?

Mr. VILAS. As I have already explained, the understanding was subsequent to the Senate's ratification.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I desire to ask about.

Mr. VILAS. It took place upon the exchange of ratifications, and necessarily, therefore, it was after the Senate had acted. The Senate acted with great promptness upon the treaty.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me for a question?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. Is it not true that it was contended by the United States that the Mosquito Coast and also some islands, which were mentioned and claimed by Great Britain afterwards, did not fall within the exception which was made by the British ambassador at the time of the exchange of ratifications?

Mr. VILAS. As to some of it, that is true. It was contended and claimed by some of our officials that the Honduras was within the terms as well, and that, though excepted by those notes of the plenipotentiaries, they could not be operative upon the treaty. There might be serious discussion about that still, sir, if it were not for another fact which I am about to mention, and that is that after we had made these contentions Great Britain receded and yielded the point in respect to her possessions that were complained of.

Let me now draw attention to some information on that subject. I will read from a message by President Buchanan, who had taken ground against Great Britain upon some of these points. In his fourth annual message, of 1860, he uses the language which I will quote and simply adopt, without further collection of evidence, as a complete and controlling proof of the existence of the fact upon which I am predicating this feature of my argument.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. LINDSAY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator will not do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Brice,	Elkins,	Mitchell, Wis.	Vilas,
Brown,	Gear,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Burrows,	George,	Murphy,	Walthall,
Butler,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Warren.
Caffery,	Gordon,	Platt,	Wetmore,
Call,	Gorman,	Pritchard,	White,
Cameron,	Harris,	Proctor,	Wilson,
Cannon,	Hill,	Quay,	Wolcott.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw the motion, as it is evident there is a quorum present. I ask that there may be a call of the Senate, the yeas and nays having disclosed the fact that there is no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call having developed the absence of a quorum, the Chair will direct a call of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	McMillan,	Roach,
Allen,	Davis,	Mantle,	Sewell,
Allison,	Faulkner,	Martin,	Shoup,
Bacon,	Frye,	Mills,	Smith,
Baker,	Gallinger,	Mitchell, Wis.	Stewart,
Berry,	Gray,	Morgan,	Teller,
Blanchard,	Hale,	Nelson,	Thurston,
Brice,	Hansbrough,	Palmer,	Tillman,
Burrows,	Hawley,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Caffery,	Hoar,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Call,	Irby,	Perkins,	White.
Chilton,	Lindsay,	Pettigrew,
Cockrell,	McBride,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senator from Wisconsin that he may lay before the Senate a resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 10th day of February, 1897, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Mr. HOAR. That is a precise copy of the resolution adopted four years ago and eight years ago, and I presume in previous years on like occasions. I ask the Senate to concur in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the concurrent resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I concur entirely with the resolution of the House of Representatives with the exception of the declaration of the election of President. The Constitution provides in express terms that the person receiving a majority shall be the President; it does not provide for any announcement by the Houses. The words in the resolution, as far as they relate to the declaration of the election of President, are words of supererogation; they are not sustained by any words in the Constitution of the United States, and they are not sustained by any precedent in the action of Congress.

Mr. MILLS. The Houses refused it in 1877.

Mr. TURPIE. They have always refused it. There is no power to declare it, but it is declared by the Constitution that the person receiving the majority shall be the President of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. That objection was taken by, I think, the Senator from Vermont, Mr. Edmunds, eight years ago. It was considered, and I think the Senate almost unanimously agreed to abide by this language. At any rate, it is the customary language. I have the Journal here containing a resolution of which this is a copy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the resolution in the same language that was used eight and four years ago?

Mr. HOAR. It is in the same language. I have the Journal here. It has been carefully compared not only by me, but by the Journal Clerk at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the tellers on the part of the Senate authorized by the concurrent resolution of the two Houses relating to the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States be appointed by the Vice-President.

REPRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask that House Document No. 279, first session Fifty-fourth Congress, which is the report of the special board sent to examine the Nicaragua Canal, may be reprinted. I have, I am assured, the last copy that can be obtained at the document room, and there is quite a demand for it. I therefore ask that it may be reprinted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Reprinted for the use of the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. For the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks that the usual number of copies be reprinted of the report of the commissioners sent to examine the Nicaragua Canal, being House Document No. 279, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if this is a part of it? [Exhibiting.]

Mr. TELLER. It is; but it contains a good many other things, and there is a demand for this special report. I have one of those myself.

Mr. VILAS. This document has only just been printed.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about the maps.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the order for printing be without maps, because with the maps it would cost over $500.

Mr. TELLER. That printing would be expensive. What I ask, however, will be inexpensive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Colorado, the Chair understands, does not include the reprinting of the maps.

Mr. TELLER. Not the reprinting of the maps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, let me recall attention to the fact that, when interrupted by the concurrent resolution and other procedure a few minutes ago, I was pointing out that the reason given by the Committee on Foreign Relations to sustain their proposition that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not obligatory, dependent upon their assertion that the British Government had violated that treaty by retaining a protectorate over what was claimed to be a part of the Mosquito Coast of Central America, had lost whatever efficacy it ever might have possessed because of the fact that, after all the discussion between our Government and Great Britain in respect to the interpretation of the treaty, Great Britain had receded and surrendered the disputed claim of protectorate, which I purpose to show by an extract from the message of President Buchanan to Congress in 1860, for which convenient proof I am indebted to my learned friend from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]:

Our relations with Great Britain are of the most friendly character. Since the commencement of my Administration the two dangerous questions arising from the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and from the right of search claimed by the British Government, have been amicably and honorably adjusted.

The discordant constructions of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty between the two Governments, which at different periods of the discussion bore a threatening aspect, have resulted in a final settlement entirely satisfactory to this Government. In my last annual message I informed Congress that the British Government had not then "completed treaty arrangements with the Republics of Honduras and Nicaragua in pursuance of the understanding between the two Governments. It is, nevertheless, confidently expected that this good work will ere long be accomplished." This confident expectation has since been fulfilled. Her Britannic Majesty concluded a treaty with Honduras on the 28th November, 1859, and with Nicaragua on the 28th August, 1860, relinquishing the Mosquito protectorate. Besides, by the former, the Bay Islands are recognized as a part of the Republic of Honduras. It may be observed that the stipulations of these treaties conform in every important particular to the amendments adopted by the Senate of the United States to the treaty concluded at London on the 17th October, 1856, between the two Governments. It will be recollected that this treaty was rejected by the British Government because of its objection to the just and important amendment of the Senate to the article relating to Ruatan and the other islands in the Bay of Honduras.—President Buchanan, fourth annual message, 1860.

Thus, Mr. President, we have the solemn declaration to Congress in 1860 by the President of the United States that the very facts alleged to have taken place in 1853, and upon which the committee base their objection to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, had been entirely obliterated so far as they might furnish a foundation of objection; and the United States not only had not exercised its right to claim an avoidance of the treaty by reason of the alleged breach of it on the part of Great Britain, but had maintained it, and finally Great Britain had receded from the particular obnoxious fact upon which the complaint had been based. And thus the treaty was left not even longer voidable, because nobody can pretend that unless the right of election was exercised while the cause of offense continued, the right of election departed from us when, at our own remonstrance, the cause of offense was withdrawn.

Mr. President, I wish to allude to another thing. I am indebted to my friend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] for another convenient statement. He put in my hand a moment ago a reference to the dispatch from Mr. Cass, when Secretary of State, to Lord Napier, in November, 1858, and in reading this paragraph I am returning to the other point of objection to the treaty, that it was obsolete, as claimed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, because of the fact that it related to a particular project by a particular concern, a proposition which I think I have already sufficiently demolished by showing that so far from relating to a particular project it was by its words, employed ex industria to convey that meaning, directed to any possible route of communication between the seas over the Isthmus, and to continue not for the term of any particular project, but forever.

In this connection I recall again the eighth article of that treaty in order that I may point out, although I have once read it, some significant words. The eighth article of that treaty, as will be remembered, was:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, etc.

When it was proposed on the part of Great Britain to entertain negotiations for an abrogation of it or a change of it, Mr. Cass said in 1858, at the very time when we were contending over the question of interpretation whether the Balize was within its terms or not:

While the declared object of that convention had reference to the construction of a ship canal, by the way of San Juan and the lakes of Nicaragua and Managua, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, yet it avowed none the less plainly a general principle in reference to all practicable communications across the Isthmus, and laid down a distinct policy by which the practical operation of this principle was likely to be kept free from all embarrassment.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is reading from Mr. Cass?

Mr. VILAS. I am reading from Mr. Cass's dispatch. He proceeds:

The principle was that the interoceanic routes should remain under the sovereignty of the states through which they ran, and be neutral and free to all nations alike. The policy was that in order to prevent any government outside of those states from obtaining undue control or influence over those interoceanic transits no such nation should "erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in vicinity thereof, or should occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the want of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and called the name of Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the roll call and before an answer to the call, the Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that an adjournment can not be moved until after the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that a motion to adjourn is always in order, whether a quorum is present or not, and therefore it is not necessary to call the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, if the Chair will pardon me, that when the want of a quorum is suggested, by the rule the roll must be called, and while the Senate is executing its order a motion to adjourn can not be entertained. You can not move to adjourn in the middle of a call of the yeas and nays, or in the middle of the execution of any other order of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would hold that if the Secretary had proceeded to call the roll and the first name had been answered to, that then the motion would be too late.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the vote on the motion to adjourn be taken by the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not entertain any business, not even a request for unanimous consent, until after the suggestion of a want of a quorum has been acted upon. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DANIEL. The roll call had begun, but no one had answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so ruled, and therefore the motion of the Senator from Virginia is in order.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate do now adjourn, upon which the Senator from Rhode Island demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I will for the day announce my general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I ask that this announcement may apply to all the votes during the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. As he has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Allen,	Gray,	Palmer,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Hill,	Pettigrew,	Turpie.
Chilton,	Lindsay,	Roach,
Cockrell,	Mills,	Smith,
Daniel,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,

NAYS—24.

Aldrich,	Dubois,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Allison,	Faulkner,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Brice,	Frye,	McBride,	Sherman,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Shoup,
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Peffer,	Stewart,
Davis,	Hawley,	Perkins,	White.

NOT VOTING—48.

Bacon,	Chandler,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Baker,	Clark,	Kyle,	Quay,
Bate,	Elkins,	McMillan,	Squire,
Berry,	Gear,	Mantle,	Tillman,
Blackburn,	George,	Martin,	Vest,
Blanchard,	Gibson,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Vilas,
Brown,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Gorman,	Murphy,	Walthall,
Call,	Hale,	Nelson,	Warren,
Cameron,	Harris,	Pasco,	Wetmore,
Cannon,	Irby,	Platt,	Wilson,
Carter,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,	Wolcott.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum not appearing on the vote, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators responded to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Allen,	Daniel,	McBride,	Sherman,
Allison,	Davis,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Bacon,	Dubois,	Morgan,	Teller,
Baker,	Faulkner,	Palmer,	Thurston,
Berry,	Frye,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Brice,	Gallinger,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Burrows,	Gray,	Perkins,	White.
Caffery,	Hansbrough,	Pettigrew,
Carter,	Hawley,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Roach,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators, pending which the Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate adjourn. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. Pending the execution of the order, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALDRICH. That can not be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no quorum, no motion can be entertained except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not sure whether it would be in order to ask that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] might be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would not be in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very sorry to see the Senator from Wisconsin cut off in this untimely way. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, pending the execution of the order of the Senate by the Sergeant-at-Arms, nothing is in order but a motion to adjourn.

Mr. VILAS. What was the request of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Rhode Island was to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. VILAS. I understood that the Senator from Rhode Island desired that I should have leave to proceed. I should like to engage him long enough in hearing what there is in objection to the pending bill to assure him that he would not vote for it——

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, pending the execution of the order of the Senate, nothing can be done, and no motion can be entertained except a motion to adjourn.

After some little delay,

Mr. CULLOM. May I inquire what is before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nothing is before the Senate except the execution of the order of the Senate, and no motion is in order except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I shall make that motion pretty soon. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINDSAY entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire how many are lacking of a quorum, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate lacks three of a quorum.

Mr. LINDSAY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is very evident that we shall not get a quorum to-night, so I have no objection to the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 4, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL BULLETIN ON THE COTTON PLANT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of Bulletin No. 33, United States Department of Agriculture, entitled The Cotton Plant: Its History, etc., with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 3328) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes;" and

A bill (S. 738) authorizing the establishment of a pier-head light at or near South Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin.

PRINTING OF CONSULAR REGULATIONS, 1896.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of House joint resolution 241, providing for the printing of the Consular Regulations of 1896.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed for the use of the members of the two Houses of Congress 1,000 copies of the Consular Regulations of 1896, and 500 copies of the same to be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents, to be sold by him at their cost of printing.

The report (by Mr. PERKINS) was read, as follows:

Your Committee on Printing, having had under consideration House joint resolution No. 241, "Providing for the printing of the Consular Regulations of 1896," report the following substitute for the same and recommend that the substitute be agreed to:

"Joint resolution providing for the printing of the Consular Regulations of 1896.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed of the Consular Regulations of 1896 1,400 copies, 300 copies for the use of the Senate, 600 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies to be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents for sale."

The Secretary of State recommends this action, stating that there is a demand for these volumes on the part of members of Congress, merchants, and applicants for consular positions, which can not be supplied by the Department, as the Department has merely enough copies for its own use and for distribution to the consular and diplomatic officers and to members of the diplomatic corps in Washington.

The Public Printer estimates the cost of printing under this resolution at $1,050.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the substitute.

Mr. CANNON. How many copies are provided for in the substitute?

Mr. PERKINS. Fourteen hundred.

Mr. CANNON. I move to make it 3,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State has only requested 1,000. That is his recommendation, and the committee made it 1,400, giving the Senate 300 copies, the House 600, and 500 copies to be placed with the Superintendent of Documents for sale. The committee has no information of any larger number being required.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out "1,400" and insert "3,000," and if the gentleman will give me a minute, I will tell him why.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have seen a copy of this book. The work has been very thoroughly done, and I understand, now that the type is set up, the cost of printing will be very slight. I will ask the gentleman how much the printing of the 1,400 copies will cost?

Mr. PERKINS. The cost for the printing of 1,400 copies will be $1,050.

Mr. CANNON. That is less than a dollar a volume, about 75 or 80 cents. Now, 1,400 copies of the Consular Regulations is a very small number. It seems to me that 3,000 would be a small number for the use of the House and Senate. I want to say to my friend that this is one book that a great many people are inquiring about, and I think the people of the United States are more able to pay this trifling expense than are the respective members of Congress to purchase the volumes to send to worthy people who ask for them.

Mr. TERRY. Do you not know that this will get you into a heap of trouble?

Mr. CANNON. I think very likely that this is about all that most of the gentlemen who are inquiring about it will get.

Mr. TERRY. I suggest to the gentleman that every one of your people who gets a copy of the book will find an office in it, and then begin to write to you about it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT], calls for 1,000 copies. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the House increasing this number, if it so desires. The gentleman in making his amendment should state how he desires this additional number of copies distributed.

Mr. CANNON. I want all the increase to go to the House and Senate.

Mr. PERKINS. It will have to be stated in the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Let us first adopt this amendment, and then I will trust to my friend to fix the other.

Mr. PERKINS. How many additional copies does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CANNON. Three thousand copies altogether.

Mr. PERKINS. Say you make it 1,500 additional. That will be 500 for the Senate and 1,000 for the House.

Mr. CANNON. That is satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois state his amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the substitute be read, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed of the Consular Regulations of 1896 1,400 copies, 300 copies for the use of the Senate, 600 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies to be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents for sale.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Illinois, as I understand, desires to strike out "three hundred for the use of the Senate" and insert "eight hundred," and strike out "six hundred for the use of the House" and insert "sixteen hundred."

Mr. CANNON. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. That will increase the whole number to 2,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2 strike out the word "fourteen" and insert the words "twenty-nine;" so as to read, "twenty-nine hundred copies;" and strike out "three" and insert "eight," and strike out "six" and insert "sixteen."

The amendments were agreed to.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ANNIE E. NOLAN.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 2129, "An act granting an increase of pension to Annie E. Nolan," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted insert $40; and the House agree to the same.

BENSON WOOD,
S. S. KIRKPATRICK,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
JNO. L. MITCHELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives make the following statement upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses:

The bill as originally passed the Senate carried a pension of $50 per month. This was reduced by the action of the House to $25. The effect of the conference report is to give the beneficiary a pension of $40 per month.

The managers on the part of the House have been led to make this concession from the fact that the soldier died of disease contracted in the service after an honorable career of over thirty-one years. He entered the Regular Army as a private, and by good conduct was promoted through the several grades to that of major of the Third United States Cavalry.

BENSON WOOD,
S. S. KIRKPATRICK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CORNETT VS. SWANSON.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, several days ago my colleague upon the Committee on Elections No. 3 gave notice of his desire to call up to-day the contested-election case of Cornett against Swanson, from the Fifth district of Virginia; and notice having been given, and there being a general understanding that it is to come up, I now call up that case for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Cornett was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth district of Virginia.

Resolved, That Claude A. Swanson was duly elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth district of Virginia, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the minority resolution as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the minority resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That neither Claude A. Swanson nor George W. Cornett was elected a member of the House of Representatives from the Fifth Congressional district of Virginia for the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, and that neither of them is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will say just one word to the House at this moment in order to state precisely what the issue is. The record shows that the contestee was elected by about 2,300 majority over the contestant. The contestant attacked about 12 precincts out of 144 in the district. If we exclude every one of those precincts that are attacked, it still leaves the contestee elected by something over 1,500 majority. There is no way possible in mathematics by which it can be figured out that the contestant has a majority, and his case is abandoned; and the case presented to the House to-day, or which will be presented by my friend from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS], my colleague upon the committee, is this: He claims that the election law of Virginia is unconstitutional, and therefore there was no valid election, and that the sitting member is not entitled to sit here. That question I shall not take the time of the House to discuss now, except simply to say that the House has already seated two members in contests who were elected under the same law, and that the rest of the delegation from Virginia who sit here uncontested sit here under that law. I think it may be well, perhaps, to have stated more particularly the questions of fact raised by the record. I will yield to my colleague from Virginia upon the committee [Mr. JONES], who prepared the report of the majority, for a statement of the facts in the case. Otherwise, I reserve my time.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to state that, excluding all the precincts that are attacked in the district, it still leaves the contestee a majority of 1,500?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. The gentleman has a correct understanding. Excluding every one of the precincts concerning which any evidence whatever is adduced, it still leaves the contestee with a plurality of 1,539 votes. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in presenting to the House the views of the majority of the committee which examined and reported this case, I shall not attempt to go to any considerable length into a discussion of the numerous legal and constitutional questions which are raised in the briefs of counsel and which are elaborately argued in the report of the minority. It is enough to say to the House now that the contestant in this case assails the election law under which this election was held. Assails it in the first place because, as it is alleged, the secrecy of the ballot, which is secured to the voter by the constitution of Virginia, is invaded by this law, and that in addition thereto numbers of voters qualified under the constitution of Virginia to vote were hindered and prevented from voting by those who conducted the election under this law.

As has already been stated to the House by my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], this election law has stood the test of a decision of the supreme court of the State of Virginia. As has also been stated to the House, every member of this House from Virginia holds his seat upon this floor under a law which is now for the first time assailed. Already this House has seated my colleague, Mr. THORP, from the Fourth Virginia district, thereby declaring that the election law of Virginia is both constitutional and valid. Already this House, in the case of Yost vs. Tucker, has decided that my colleague, Mr. TUCKER, is entitled to a seat upon this floor. If, Mr. Speaker, the then election law of Virginia was unconstitutional, if the law under which this election was held was fraudulent, invalid, and inoperative, as is maintained in the minority report, then, as a matter of fact, neither my colleague, General WALKER, from the Ninth district, nor myself, nor any other Representative from Virginia is entitled to a seat upon this floor.

The committee, however, have found in their examination of this case that even if the provisions of the Virginia election law which are assailed in the report of the minority are invalid, inoperative, and unconstitutional, as they are alleged to be—even in that event, they would have no difficulty in finding that the contestee, Mr. Swanson, was legally elected, and therefore entitled to retain his seat.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman whether the courts of Virginia have declared the election law to be unconstitutional?

Mr. JONES. On the contrary, the supreme court of Virginia, by a unanimous decision, has declared that this election law is constitutional; and let me say further to the gentleman that the objection urged by the contestant to this law is that it is obnoxious to certain provisions of the constitution of the State of Virginia, not of the Federal Constitution. Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the committee, after carefully investigating all these legal and constitutional questions, have come to the deliberate conclusion that even if those provisions of the election law which are assailed were inoperative and unconstitutional, there would still remain enough of the law under which the election was held to leave no question as to the fairness and legality of the contestee's election.

The Fifth Congressional district of the State of Virginia is composed of 7 counties and 2 cities. In that district there are 144 election precincts, and the evidence which has been taken in this case applies to and affects only 12 of those 144 precincts. The notice of contest only informs the contestee that the vote in 5 of these 144 precincts will be drawn in question. The committee has carefully gone into the vote in each one of these 12 precincts as to which any testimony has been taken, although as to 7 of them no notice was given in the notice of contest, and we have found that, giving to the contestant the full benefit of every claim set up by him, either in his notice of contest or in the briefs of counsel, he still lacks more than 1,500 votes of enough to elect him. The first precinct assailed in the notice of contest is the Third Ward of the city of Danville. In that city there are three wards.

The third is the only one with reference to which any testimony has been taken, and nearly one-half of the record in this case is taken up with testimony bearing upon and related to that particular precinct. I may say, by way of preface, that this precinct is known to be the largest Democratic precinct in the Fifth Congressional district. It embraces within its limits the resident portion of the city of Danville, and within that precinct the wealthiest and most intelligent people of the city reside. There are in that precinct, upon the poll books, as this record discloses, 280 more white voters than there are colored voters, and it is established by the testimony of the witnesses for the contestant that in this precinct the white people as a rule vote the Democratic ticket, and the colored people as a rule vote the Republican ticket. According to the returns of the commissioners of election, although the white voters outnumber the colored voters by 280, the contestee's majority in this precinct was only 228.

Now, without going into this mass of testimony, which, as I have said, covers nearly one-half of the record in this case, I will merely state that the committee in dealing with this case, and knowing that it would make no difference as to the result, have thrown out this entire precinct and taken from Mr. Swanson every one of his majority in the largest Democratic precinct in the Fifth Congressional district. Mr. Swanson's returned majority is 2,333. Subtracting from that his majority of 228 at this precinct will leave him still 2,105 majority.

The next precinct attacked by the contestant in the notice of contest is that of Design, in the county of Pittsylvania. The contestant claims in his notice of contest that this precinct should be thrown out, because there were not provided by the election officers sufficient booths to accommodate all those offering to vote. If we grant this claim without going into an analysis of the testimony, because, as I have already said, to make this admission does not affect the result in this case—if we concede, merely for the sake of argument, that the contention of the contestant is a just one and disfranchise every legal voter at this precinct, the result would simply be to take from Mr. Swanson 52 additional votes, which would still leave him a majority of 2,053.

The third precinct assailed in the notice of contest is that of Stokesland, also in the county of Pittsylvania. There were rejected at that precinct for certain imperfections and irregularities 111 ballots. But the contestant claims in his brief that a certain witness of his proved that there were 157 votes cast for him in that precinct. This would hardly be regarded as convincing testimony by anybody in the face of the official returns. It would therefore be showing the greatest liberality toward the contestant if we had said that every one of those 111 votes which were rejected on account of imperfect marking ought to have been counted for the contestant. But we go further than that, and we give to him, in order to show the absurdity of his claim, the 157 votes which one of his witnesses says ought to have been counted for him. To do this will leave the contestee still a majority of 1,896.

The fourth precinct mentioned in the contestant's notice is that of Dry Fork, in Pittsylvania County. The contestant claims that a list of those who said they voted for him was kept at this precinct, and that he was entitled to 65 votes, and not 43, as the returns gave him. He also claims that the contestee actually received 46, instead of 68 votes returned for him. Concede this to be true—allow both claims—and he would be entitled to 44 additional votes. Deduct those 44 votes, and the contestee still has a majority of 1,852.

The fifth and last precinct as to which there is any mention or charge in the notice of contest is that of Martinsville, in the county of Henry. As to this precinct there is considerable testimony; but the contestant fails to state what he claims is due him at this precinct, or what disposition the committee or this House ought to make of the vote of the precinct. There were rejected as illegal at this precinct 38 votes. The contestant's majority at the precinct was 40. If we were to give to him every one of those rejected votes, it would be all that he could claim; but inasmuch as it would be more favorable to him to throw out the entire poll, we do that, and instead of deducting 38 votes from the contestee's majority we deduct 40, leaving the majority of the contestee 1,812.

I have now briefly gone over the 5 precincts that are mentioned in the notice of contest. There are 7 other precincts, not mentioned in the notice of contest, but as to which testimony was taken. I will take up each one of those precincts one by one. Let us first take Young's precinct, in Franklin County. There the contestee's majority was 7. The contestant failed to make in his brief any specific claim as to this precinct. The best claim that could be made for him from his testimony is to deduct 2 votes from Swanson and to give Cornett 28, making a difference of 30. If we threw out the whole precinct, it would take only 7 votes from Swanson. As it would be more favorable to the contestant to give him the 30 additional votes, the committee in its computation have given them to him, and therefore I deduct them from the contestee's majority. To do this will leave the contestee a majority of 1,782.

Rocky Mount is another precinct concerning which testimony was taken, although not mentioned in the notice. The returned vote for the contestee at that precinct was 241; that for the contestant, 147; rejected ballots, 38. The most advantageous thing for the contestant being to throw out this precinct, instead of counting for him the 38 rejected ballots, we throw it out, and thus take from the contestee's majority 94, leaving his majority 1,688. In that county, containing 19 precincts, these are the only 2 precincts concerning which any testimony at all was taken.

The next precinct is Stuart's, in the county of Patrick. The white registered voters in that county numbered 2,459; the colored voters, only 340. There are witnesses for the contestant who swear that there was no fraud or unfairness in the election anywhere in this county. No specific claim is made by the contestant in his brief as to this precinct. The contestee's majority there was 33, and there were rejected 20 votes. In our computation we throw out the entire precinct; and though the contestant himself does not ask for it, we take those 32 votes from the contestee, leaving him still 1,656 majority over the contestant.

Ridgeway precinct, Henry County, is also drawn in question by reason of certain testimony having been taken in regard to it. The contestant makes no specific claim as to this precinct. The contestee's vote at this precinct was 152, the contestant's 105, giving the contestee a majority of 47. The committee, without going into the evidence in regard to this precinct, and with the sole purpose of showing that the contestant has no case according to his own showing, throw out this poll and take this majority away from the contestee. It will leave him 1,609 majority.

At Scotts Tanyard precinct the contestant's vote was 73 and the contestee's 48. The contestant's majority at this precinct was 25, the rejected ballots 15. There was no specific claim made as to this precinct by the contestant, but to throw out the poll would be to take from him 25 votes. So, instead of throwing out the poll in this case, as the committee has done in the other cases where the contestee had the majority, we have counted every rejected vote for the contestant. This would reduce the contestee's majority to 1,594. But lest it should be thought that on account of the alleged misconduct of the constable at this precinct more than that should be done for the contestant, we have concluded to give the contestant every vote he received, and every ballot which was rejected but not counted, no matter for whom intended, and to take from Swanson, the contestee, every single vote that was cast for him at this precinct. When we have done this, there is still left to Swanson a majority of 1,546.

Jacksonville precinct, Floyd County, is the next precinct drawn in question. This is the only precinct in that county concerning which there is any testimony. The contestant fails to specify in his brief what he claims as to this precinct, and the committee was left in doubt as to what he desired it should do.

One Sowder, a lawyer and a Republican, testifies that 42 ballots were rejected, and all the witnesses agree that 26 of them were illegal; and it was found that of the 16 that it was thought should be counted, 3 were for Swanson and 13 for Cornett, the contestant. If the difference between 3 and 13 of the ballots rejected, namely 10, is added to the contestant's vote, the contestee would still have a majority of 1,536.

At Independence precinct, in Grayson County, testimony was also taken, and this is the last of the 12 with reference to which any testimony whatever was taken. At this precinct the judges rejected 30 ballots. In this number only 4 votes could have been affected, as shown by the testimony. We have deducted these 4 votes from the contestant's majority and leave him still a clear majority of 1,532 votes over the contestant, after counting and allowing every single claim that is made on his part either in notice of contest or in briefs of counsel and after giving him the benefit of all doubts. The committee did not believe, and I do not believe, that any of these claims were established.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to another matter that may be deemed of some importance by some members of this body. In the last contested-election case from Virginia determined by this House a great deal of discussion was had and a great deal said about ballots rejected on account of improper marking. In the county of Carroll no testimony was taken affecting a single vote; but there is a certificate in the record from the county clerk of that county which merely shows that there were rejected as improperly marked 124 ballots in that county. There were cast in that county 2,568 votes, so that according to this certificate less than 5 per cent of the total vote polled in the county of Carroll was rejected on account of improper marking. There is no claim in the notice of contest, there is no evidence taken to show that one single one of these rejected votes was improperly rejected. There is simply that isolated fact in the record that there were that many rejected votes. Take every one of these votes and give them to the contestant, and, as I have already shown, it would not materially affect the contestee's majority.

A great deal was also said in that contested-election case from Virginia to which I have just alluded in regard to the alternation of the names upon the ballots which where used at the election. In two of the counties in this district—the counties of Henry and Grayson—the names on the ballots were alternated. In Henry County there were rejected 177 ballots, and in Grayson County the judges rejected 103 ballots, or a fraction over 7 per cent of the vote polled in the one county and a fraction over 4 per cent in the other. If the entire polls of the two counties be rejected—if instead of counting these rejected ballots for contestant this House should deem it proper on account of the alternation of names to declare the election invalid in these two counties and thus deprive thousands of voters of their right to have their legal votes counted—the result would not affect the contestee but to the extent of 126 votes, because the majority of the contestee in one county was 48 and in the other 78.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have already shown that in one of these counties, that of Henry, the 74 votes which were rejected at Ridgeway and the 15 at Scotts Tan Yard have been already counted for contestant. So, also, contestant has been given the benefit of the 38 votes rejected at Martinsville, in the same county.

From the figures which I have thus given the House it must be apparent to every member that if the entire polls of the two counties where the names upon the ballots were alternated were thrown out and disregarded, the contestee would still have remaining between 1,300 and 1,400 uncontested and unassailed majority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not seriously contended on the part of the contestant that he received a majority of the legal votes in this district. It is not asserted in any brief. On the contrary, it is admitted in the briefs that the contestant has not made any tabulated statement showing that he was elected, and that he bases his claim that Mr. Swanson should be unseated upon the sole ground that the Virginia election law is unconstitutional. He does not ask to be given a seat on this floor. He does not claim to have been legally elected. The report of the minority of the committee does not make any such claim for him, and the resolutions which that minority have offered, as a substitute, simply declare that there was no election in the district. It seems to me, sir, that at this late date in the Fifty-fourth Congress, when scarcely a month of its life remains, this House will scarcely be guilty of the injustice and the inconsistency of declaring a law unconstitutional when it has upheld the validity of that law upon three former occasions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this House will thus stultify itself. If this law is unconstitutional now, it was equally so when this House seated one member elected under it and confirmed the title to their seats of two other members. What could possibly be gained by such a course? Between now and the 4th day of March this district would remain unrepresented on this floor. It would be impossible to hold a special election in this limited time, and to send here another Representative from this district. No good could be accomplished by declaring that this election was invalid, and that the law of Virginia under which it was held was unconstitutional.

I may add, Mr. Speaker, in this connection, that the Walton law, under which this election was held, was tried for the first time in this election in 1894. I may also add that since that time those features of that law which have been most vigorously assailed in this case have been altered or repealed by a subsequent act of our legislature. The law now being considered by this House is not the present election law of Virginia, so that in no sense could any good be accomplished by declaring that law to be unconstitutional.

Mr. Speaker, this district is not a Republican district, as some people count Southern districts. This is a white district. There are more than twice as many white voters in this district than there are colored voters. For twenty-two years prior to this election, with only the exception of one Congress, this district has been represented by a Democrat, and the vote which my colleague, the contestee [Mr. Swanson], received at the election which preceded this, and before the enactment of the Walton law, resulted in a larger majority for him than he received at the election which we are now considering. So it seems to me that no argument can be advanced by anybody which would justify this body declaring this law unconstitutional.

I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that I would not go into any extended discussion of the law of this case. It is the Virginia constitution which this law is supposed to be obnoxious to. The highest judicial tribunal in my State has declared that it violates no provision of that State constitution, and this House will not undertake, I think, to override that decision, which I hold to be sound and just in every particular. It would be a useless consumption of time for me to undertake to read to this House the numerous authorities bearing upon this subject, and which hold that the decisions of a supreme court of a State interpreting and construing the laws of that State should be respected by every other tribunal in our land. For the sake of the argument, and because it was the easiest way to dispose of the contestant's pretensions and claims in this case, we have allowed him everything and more than he claimed. Let it be distinctly understood, however, that the committee does not believe that the testimony in this case warrants this computation we have made, and which has only been made in order to show how utterly groundless is the claim that the contestant makes to a seat in this House.

With this brief opening, I leave the case in the hands of my colleagues upon the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, four questions arise upon the record in this case to which the attention of the House will be called in order.

The first is as to the sufficiency of the notice of contest; the second is as to the right of appeal to this House; the third is as to the validity of the Virginia election law known as the Walton law; and the fourth is the effect of its operation upon the elective franchise as known to our system of popular Government.

Before entering upon the discussion of this case it will be well to take a comprehensive view of the election law of Virginia, called the Walton law, with which we are to deal.

For this purpose I will recapitulate the summary contained in the minority report (Report 1473, part 2), which not only brings out the salient features of the law, but throws much light upon the evident intent which led to its adoption and the obvious effect of its operation.

It is claimed by its supporters to be an adaptation of the Australian system. This in itself at first is enough to recommend the law; but upon examination it will be found to be a strange adaptation and the source of great danger. It has been said there is nothing more dangerous than a half truth It has enough of light in it to allure and attract and enough of wrong to deceive and ruin.

The Walton law of Virginia is in the nature of one of these half truths. It has adopted the form of the Australian ballot, but stripped it of its essential features and destroyed its spirit and life. For example, the necessary complexity of a single ballot which must contain all the names of the various candidates is guarded against in other States, such as Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Kentucky, Vermont, and Maryland, where wholesome restraints are provided against a long list of needless candidates. By the Walton law any number of names can be placed on the ballot, and as was done in this election, names which appeared to be the same, but which slightly differed in spelling were placed on the ballot. Other States provide such safeguards against fraud as results from requiring that the several political parties shall be represented among the election officers. Under the Walton law they may all belong to one party, as they did in this election. In other States provisions are made for acquainting all voters with the form and substance of the ballot by requiring it to be published in the newspapers and posted at the voting precincts on and before the day of the election. By the Walton law this is not only prohibited, but the two or three officials who print and have the custody of the ballot are prohibited by penal enactments from exposing them or from divulging their contents. In other States the names of the several candidates must be placed on the ballot in a certain order well known to the public and in plain roman type. By the Walton law they may, as was done in this election, print the names in six different orders and in the confusing type of the German text.

In other States separate booths for every fifty and at least for every hundred voters must be provided. By the Walton law there need be but one booth for hundreds of voters, so that it might be a physical impossibility for all to vote, as was true in some precincts at this election.

In other States the illiterate elector is qualified to vote because every customary avenue of knowledge is open to him and the assistance of his friends, neighbors, and educated children is available. Under the Walton law all these avenues of knowledge are closed and the illiterate voter disqualified by being deprived of the assistance of any friend of his choice.

In other States the mode of election is such that every man is satisfied that his ballot is cast for the candidates of his choice. Under the Walton law the illiterate man casts a vote prepared by a political enemy, with nothing to satisfy him that it was not cast for the man he desired to defeat.

In other States no man but the voter can know for whom he voted and his ballot is absolutely secret. Under the Walton law he must tell a special constable, even if he be a political adversary, whom he intends to vote for, and must either reveal the secrecy of his ballot or be disfranchised, whereby it clearly appears that the Walton law repels men from the ballot box.

Now, our contention is that this law disqualifies every illiterate voter by compelling him to vote through another person; that it destroys the secrecy of the ballot by compelling the voter to disclose the name of his candidate, and that it repels and discourages citizens from voting by making it possible for the political party which conducts the election to appropriate the illiterate vote to its own use.

The first question raised in this case by the contestee is as to the sufficiency of the notice.

The notice is, in substance, as follows:

First. That the operation of the law known as the Walton election law, under which said election was held, was unjust, fraudulent, and illegal, in that no ballots nor samples thereof, nor information nor advice as to contents and the position and order of names thereon, was given or published, or allowed by said law to be given or published, to any elector in said district, but contestant alleges the fact to be that said ballots were kept in the secret and exclusive possession of said officers of said election, consisting of three judges and special constable, sworn to secrecy as to the contents of the same, and that each elector was compelled, after entering a private apartment or booth, to only use in voting a ballot in form as aforesaid by said judges furnished; and in expressing a choice for said candidates were required to draw a horizontal line covering at least three-fourths of the printed names of three of the candidates, leaving unmarked the name of the candidate for whom elector desired to vote, and that every voter unable to read, or physically incompetent to prepare his ballot, was thus compelled and required to call upon the special constable to aid in preparing the same; and that the said special constable appointed in every precinct in said district was a Democrat and member of contestee's party, and supporting contestee in said election.

Second. That there were four names of candidates for Congress, including the names of contestee and contestant, on all tickets used in voting at said election, all of said names being printed, as required by law, on the same piece of paper, and that the Democratic authorities and supporters of contestee having sole charge of and direction of printing of said ballots, wrongfully, fraudulently, unlawfully printed and directed and caused to be printed the name of contestant in alternate and various positions on said tickets used at each voting precinct in said Congressional district; that is to say, contestant's name was, as aforesaid, arranged and printed on said ballots first and second and third and fourth, in relation to the names of the said other contestants, by reason of which the said contestant was unable to assist and instruct as to the true position of his name on said tickets, all voters not able to read desiring to vote for said contestant, whereby said electors were unlawfully deprived of the exercise of their lawful franchise and contestant deprived of 500 ballots, more or less, meant to be cast for contestant by such illiterate voters; and that the same were unlawfully manipulated and cast or procured to be cast and counted for contestee.

Third. That the officers required by law to appoint the judges of election and special constable in the cities of Danville and Neapolis and Pittsylvania County were furnished by the chairman of the Republican committee of said county with a list of orderly and discreet Republican electors, being of the different political faith of that of contestee, and who favored the election of contestant, and were requested by said chairman and required by the laws of said State to select one or more of said electors to act in said trusts, but contestant alleges the fact to be that the said appointing authorities wrongfully and unlawfully neglected and failed and refused so to do, that is to say, such authorities with intent to prevent a free ballot and an honest count in said election, appointed in the several voting precincts in said places only 5 of said electors, and that the remaining 103 of said officers so appointed were of the same political party as contestee and in favor of contestee's election, and that at 34 out of 42 voting places in said precincts there were so appointed either a postmaster or a Federal revenue officer, or both, said Federal officials owing their respective positions to the patronage and procurance of contestee.

Fourth. That one of the judges of election at Design precinct, in Pittsylvania County, appointed as aforesaid, was at the time of appointment and at the time of said election under indictment in a Federal court for alleged fraud and violation of the election laws of Virginia, of all which the said appointing authorities were fully advised.

That, in addition to the above, said notice contains twelve other specifications relating to insufficiency in number of booths, to the invasion of voting precinct by crowds, to the destroying of ballots, to the rejection of Republican witnesses to the count, to frauds of special constables, to the manipulation of ballots, to the counting of fraudulent votes, to limiting the hours of voting, to bribery, and to the invasion of the booths.

That this notice is abundantly sufficient to raise the question as to the constitutionality of the law there can be no doubt. Certainly the simple statement of the point without any specification whatever would be enough to apprise the contestee of the nature of the issue he would be called upon to try.

As to allegations of fraud practiced at the election and growing out of the operation of the law, the particularity of the specifications would depend upon the nature of the fraud. If, for example, the evidence of fraud was in the possession of an adverse party whose interests would be to hinder and obscure investigation, then a general charge would suffice; whereas in other cases more specific charges might be necessary.

THE RIGHT OF APPEAL.

The next question in order relates to the right of the House of Representatives to inquire into the validity of the Walton law.

It is apparent from what has been said that a system has been adopted by the legislature of Virginia by which a large body of her citizens are disfranchised, or, what is worse, compelled to vote through another person known as the vote fixer, with no possible means of verifying the vote so cast; that such a system necessarily repels the voters from the ballot box, destroys the secrecy of the ballot, and disqualifies every illiterate voter by withholding from him the ordinary means of knowledge.

It now remains to be stated that an attempt is being made by the contestee to overawe the House of Representatives and silence criticism and close the doors of investigation by reenforcing this law with a decision of the supreme court of Virginia affirming its constitutionality.

As to the political rights of American citizens, let me say the House of Representatives is preeminently the people's tribunal. It is familiarly known as the popular branch of the Government. In its representative character it is very near the people. It not only has original jurisdiction as to the right of a person to a seat in its Hall, but is also a tribunal of last resort. The most that could be claimed for the supreme court of Virginia in any case would be a concurrent jurisdiction. But after all the election law of a State has a twofold relation—first, as it applies to the State officials, and second, as it applies to the United States officials. It would seem, therefore, that the supreme court of a State would have exclusive jurisdiction as to the election of State officers and that the House of Representatives would have exclusive jurisdiction as to the election of its members, and that there is really no concurrent jurisdiction between them. If this be true, then the decision of neither would be a plea in bar to the other.

But let us suppose the jurisdiction concurrent, and apply the rule by which one court is governed by the decision of another in judicial practice.

It is contended that the decision of the supreme court of Virginia in the case of Pearsons et al. vs. Board of Supervisors, etc., having upheld the Walton law, the House of Representatives is concluded thereby.

The contestee says:

> The committee might have had some difficulties confronting it but for the fact that recently the supreme court of appeals of Virginia, the highest court in the State, has passed upon this question after full argument and by a unanimous court.

I have therefore carefully examined the case cited for two reasons, first, to ascertain whether the supreme court of Virginia has legally passed upon the question, and secondly, whether the question is of such vital national interest as to challenge the attention of the House of Representatives whether the State court has passed upon it or not. It appears that a suit in chancery was commenced, that the bill was taken as confessed in the lower court, that there was no appearance or opposition by the defendant, and on the hearing the case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction; and from this judgment the petitioners appealed to the supreme court, which in turn refused the appeal for the reason, as they state, that the petitioners had a plain and adequate remedy at law under section 836 of the Code of Virginia, without resorting to the court of chancery.

While, therefore, the existence of this suit was of short duration and barren of real results, a trifling incident, which at first appeared of no significance, unexpectedly assumed gigantic proportions. That incident was the excuse which the petitioners set forth in their bill for trying to collect a common-law debt in the court of chancery, namely, that the election law of Virginia, called the Walton law, was unconstitutional. The court, with a judicial penetration worthy of its exalted position, perceived that the reference to the Walton law was wholly irrelevant to the case; but still desiring for some reason to deal with this question, made this explanation, as follows:

> Accompanying the petition is a brief filed by counsel for petitioners, in which the many interesting questions of law arising upon the record are thoroughly discussed. We feel, therefore, that upon the part of the petitioners at least we are in possession of all the means of information which would be accessible to us were the appeal allowed and the case set down for argument. We feel, too, that the questions presented are of the utmost interest to every citizen of the State. We are upon the eve of an election in which many important offices are to be filled, and it is much to be desired that all uncertainty as to the law under which these elections are to be conducted should be removed, and it is therefore a matter of congratulation that the plaintiffs have, in presenting their case to us, thrown sufficient light upon it to enable us to dispose of it without delay and with entire confidence.

At the close of their decision the court further said:

> If, however, we had come to a different conclusion as to the constitutional questions involved in the record which accompanies the petition in this case, we should still be obliged to refuse the appeal asked for, as the plaintiff had a plain and adequate remedy at law under section 836 of the Code of Virginia without resorting to a bill in chancery. For the foregoing reasons we deny the appeal asked for by the petitioners.

It therefore appears from the statement of the court itself that it had no jurisdiction in the case over either the process or the subject-matter; that the constitutional question did not grow out of the petition, but out of a brief that accompanied the petition; that but one side of the case was presented and discussed, and that the case was never set down for argument. The further statement that "the plaintiffs have thrown sufficient light upon the case to enable us to dispose of the case with entire confidence" is a frank confession by the court that the above grounds for assuming jurisdiction of the question might not be perfectly satisfactory to everybody when the magnitude of the question involved should be realized, and that a criticising public might need the further assurance from them that they were not acting in total darkness.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman mean to assert that from the opinion of the court of appeals it is apparent that this constitutional question was raised in the argument of counsel, and was not raised in the bill and in the petition?

Mr. THOMAS. I stated very clearly what the court said. The court said that they acted in confidence because of the presentation made in the brief.

Mr. JONES. I understood the gentleman to use this language:

> It therefore appears from the statement of the court itself that it had no jurisdiction in the case over either the process or the subject-matter; that the constitutional question did not grow out of the petition, but out of a brief that accompanied the petition.

Mr. THOMAS. I mean to say that, certainly.

Mr. JONES. Is it not a fact that the bill in chancery of which you have spoken raises this constitutional question? Is it not a fact that the petition of which you have spoken raises this question and assigns eleven different reasons why this law is unconstitutional?

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman will be patient, I will reach that in a moment.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman if that is not the fact; if the petition does not set forth eleven distinct grounds?

Mr. THOMAS. I will come to that.

In addition to this lack of authority of the court, I would call attention to some facts which tend to show that the case was to some extent a collusive one, a fact which in itself, if true, would invalidate the judgment. The plaintiff is said to have had a bill to collect for work and labor against Brunswick County, for which he had a plain statutory remedy. Instead of pursuing this course he did the extraordinary and singular thing of filing a bill in chancery. The lower court immediately dismissed the case for want of jurisdiction. It is not clear from the record but that this was on the motion of the plaintiff himself, for it appears that the defendant paid no attention to the case; that the bill was taken as confessed, and that then the court, on its own motion or that of the plaintiff, dismissed the bill; that the plaintiff then, instead of bringing his suit in the proper court, appeals to the supreme court. In the supreme court the defendant again takes no part in the case. What is most remarkable is that in all of this proceeding the plaintiff is ostensibly an enemy of this Walton law, seeking to have it declared null and void. So far as this record goes the Walton law had not a friend in all Virginia. As a matter of common knowledge, at least four contested-election cases were pending in the State, all depending on the validity of the Walton law. But this humble laborer, trying to collect his bill for work and labor, had neither the help of the contestants nor the opposition of the contestees. And when the plaintiff succeeds finally in persuading the court to defeat him, he seems perfectly resigned and satisfied, enters no motion for a rehearing, pays the costs in both courts, and utterly disappears.

In Black's Treatise on Judgments, volume 2, section 699, it is stated:

> In order to make a valid judgment the suit must not be collusive or simulated; there must be a real interest, a real argument, a real prosecution, a real defense, and a real decision.

In Elliott's Appellate Proceedings, page 101, it is said:

> If the court is satisfied that the question presented is not actually in controversy, but that the case is brought merely to obtain the decision of the court on an abstract or hypothetical question, the appeal will not be entertained.

I would also call attention to the fact, clearly admitted by the court in their decision, that the question of the constitutionality of the Walton law was wholly immaterial to the case before them.

In Black on Judgments, volume 2, section 611, it is stated that—

> A point that comes up incidentally and is not necessary to the disposition of the case is obiter dictum and not entitled to the weight of precedent.

Such decisions are declared to be without the force of adjudication. (17 S. & R. Penn., 292.) A want of jurisdiction makes a judgment a nullity, and it may be so treated by any court in any proceeding, direct or collateral. (Wade et al. vs. Hancock, 76 Va., 620.)

We are, therefore, of the opinion, in view of the magnitude of the question, involving the political rights of more than 100,000 of the voters of Virginia, the irregular character of the suit, the strange and one-sided manner in which it was conducted and the suddenness with which it was abandoned, the irrelevancy of the Walton law to the controversy, and because the constitutional rights of American citizens are directly involved, that the House of Representatives may inquire into the validity of the Walton election law of Virginia in this case.

The next question in order is: Is the election law of Virginia, known as the Walton law, valid?

(a) The constitution of Virginia, Article III, section 1, provides that every male citizen of the United States 21 years old, residing in the State, is entitled to vote; and section 2 of the same article provides that all elections shall be by ballot. It is clear, therefore, that every illiterate elector in Virginia had a constitutional right to vote by ballot on the 6th of November, 1894.

(b) The vote by ballot ex vi termini implies a secret ballot. The secrecy of the ballot is a right which inheres in the voter, and of which he can not, against his will, be lawfully deprived. "All devices by which party managers are able to distinguish ballots and determine whether an elector is voting for particular persons are opposed to the spirit of the constitution." (6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, page 348.)

> The right to vote in this manner has usually been considered an important and valuable safeguard—> of the humblest citizen against the influence which wealth and station might be supposed to exercise. (People vs. Pease, 27 N. Y., 81.)

A statute which requires the placing of a number of the ballot on the poll book opposite the voter's name and a corresponding number on the back of the voter's ballot is unconstitutional as a violation of the right of secrecy. (Williams vs. Stein, 38 Ind., 39.)

Courts have gone so far as to hold that a witness in a judicial proceeding can not be compelled to disclose for whom he voted. Public policy requires the veil of secrecy to be impenetrable, unless the voter himself voluntarily determines to lift it. (Cooley's Const. Limitations, pages 604–606.)

In the present case one of the witnesses, Mr. John H. Johnson, ex-mayor of the city of Danville, testifies:

I have heard hundreds of good citizens of this town, both merchants and mechanics, say they would not support the Democratic party if they could live and make a support for their families against the heavy pressure that would be brought against them by party leaders. It is a known fact that the Democratic party had what is known as the "black list" in Danville, and when you were put upon that list you could not get any employment. I have had men come to me and tell me that if I expected to live in Danville I had better affiliate with the Democratic party.

So it will be seen that the necessity for a secret ballot would seem to be as essential in Virginia as it was in Indiana at the time of the decision we have cited above.

(c) The Walton law invades and destroys the right of secret voting.

No one will deny this. The supreme court of Virginia in their dictum admit it when they say:

A man unable to read must in the nature of things so far compromise the secrecy of his ballot as to invoke and obtain the aid of others in the preparation of his ballot.

Now, I am unable to see that it is or ever has been necessary for the illiterate voter of Virginia to compromise the secrecy of his ballot by invoking the aid of others in the preparation of it. That the aid of others to some extent under any possible system will be necessary to the illiterate voter is admitted, but not to the extent of compromising the secrecy of his ballot. Let us examine this question very carefully, for it lies very near the core of the controversy. How was it under the old election law? Under that law each party had separate ballots. Having determined which party to support, all the preparation necessary was to secure the right ballot. This every illiterate voter could do by relying upon any friend of his choice, a neighbor, an educated son or daughter, or a well-known member of his own party. But even then his informant could not know what ballot he finally voted. How is it under the new law? Separate ballots are abolished, and the names of rival candidates are all placed on one piece of paper. The law provides that this paper shall contain only the names of the different candidates with the title of each office, and on the back the official seal, to prevent forgery. The order in which the names are to be printed is not provided for. This one fact is veiled in secrecy, and made absolutely inaccessible by official oaths and penal enactments. Since all rival candidates are on the same ticket, it becomes necessary for each voter to know where on the ballot the name of his candidate is placed. This law provides that the voter shall not know this fact until he is shut out from the world in a secluded booth 40 feet away from any spectator, and that it shall be a crime for anyone, by either word, sign, or gesture, to give him any information, and that in this situation he is given a ticket just two and one-half minutes before he is required to vote it.

If the law stopped here, it would disfranchise every voter who could not read, and there would be no question of its unconstitutionality, but it goes one step further and offers the voter one single opportunity for gaining a knowledge of this one essential fact, viz, where to find the name of his candidate. It provides that he may ask one man, but no other, and he is designated as a special constable. This man may be a stranger or may belong to the party which the voter desires to defeat, or the voter may know him personally and have no confidence in him; there is no witness in sight or hearing, he has no means of knowing whether the information is right or wrong, no way of correcting an error, mistake, or fraud, and can never know by any means that would satisfy the heart or conscience of any rational man whether he voted for or against his own candidate. But this is not the worst of it. Before he can gain even this unsatisfactory assistance he is compelled to compromise the secrecy of his ballot by informing the constable who he intends to vote for. When the transaction is ended, the illiterate voter is sure of but one fact, and that is that he has revealed the nature of the vote he intended to cast to one he did not wish to make a confidant of. What wonder, then, that the record contains such evidence as the following:

W. H. Hale, 32 years old, an agent and operator (record, page 14):

Q. What effect did the operation of the Walton election law have upon the voter; whether or not a free and unrestrained ballot as the Constitution guarantees to every voter, or a tendency to deter, hinder, prevent, and keep away from the polls on election day, thus being afraid their ballots would be unfairly counted or illegally cast?

A. I think the effect was to keep a great many voters away from the polls, believing that their votes would not be counted as cast when in the hands of a special constable. This opinion is based upon conversation with people throughout the country.

L. W. Morgan, 44 years of age, a farmer (record, page 19):

Q. Was the operation of the election law such as to deter and prevent men from voting?

A. As a matter of fact, a great many did not vote at certain precincts in the county, notably, at Dickenson precinct, urging as a reason want of confidence in the special officer of election. I refer to the illiterate voters.

L. S. Thomas, 36 years old, student at law (record, page 39):

I think a number of voters failed to appear at the election because of the new law.

Dennis Hairston, colored, 60 years old (record, page 40):

Q. Did you vote at last election for Congressman?

A. No, sir. * * *

Q. Weren't you advised by some of your Republican friends not to vote?

A. No, sir; they wanted me to vote, but I couldn't see how I could vote and be justified in it, voting through some other man.

Q. Did you ever vote unless you were told by some one how you voted?

A. I had some friends out I could rely upon to show my ticket from one to another and be satisfied.

George L. Gravely, 36 years old, lawyer (record, page 49):

Q. Please state the effect of the Walton law upon the illiterate voters of your section in reference to deterring them from voting under the operation of said law.

A. I think from conversations which I had with Republican voters that the Walton law had the effect of deterring a great number of illiterate voters of that party from voting at the late Congressional election.

In marked contrast with this Walton law, which purports to be an adaptation of the Australian system, is the adaptation of the same system in the State of Michigan. Every reasonable precaution is taken to guard against fraud and to secure the rights of citizens to a free and untrammeled ballot. To do so they have exactly reversed that feature of the law we have been considering. Instead of suppressing the knowledge of the place on ballots for each candidate, it is provided that an enlarged copy of the official ballot shall be displayed at voting precincts before the time and at the election for the purpose of educating the voters and instructing them how to prepare their ballots. If such facilities for instructing voters are only reasonable and proper in a State where not more than 4 per cent of the voters are illiterate, can less facilities and opportunities be regarded as reasonable in a State where every third voter can neither read nor write?

The supreme court of Virginia in their dictum confess that the whole question of the legality of the election law turns upon its reasonableness.

This law, therefore, which compels a voter to enter the voting precinct ignorant of every fact essential to be known, and but for which he would be qualified to cast a free, independent, and secret ballot, disqualifies the voter and is null and void.

The voter must know where on the ballot the names of his candidates are. If he is permitted to gain this knowledge by ordinary means, he can cast an independent and secret ballot. If he is compelled to seek this information from a single individual against his will, the freedom and secrecy of the ballot is destroyed.

I feel warranted, therefore, in the conclusion that where the organic law of a State confers the right to vote by secret ballot, any mode of election provided by the legislature must, to be valid, provide methods of voting which are within the capacity of those thus enfranchised.

A mode of election which compels such an elector to reveal to anyone the nature of his ballot would defeat such a constitution. Under the Walton law only those electors who can read can cast a secret ballot. Therefore the Walton law defeats the constitution by disfranchising those who can not read.

PARTISANSHIP UNDER THE WALTON LAW.

Another test of the unreasonableness of the Walton law in providing this mode of election is the arbitrary power it gives to the party in ascendency. Interpreted in the light of the recent election, with 110,000 illiterate voters in the State, every one of whom must cast his vote through a special officer appointed by the party in power, and who knows the character of every ballot before it is cast, it is morally certain that while human nature remains as it is the party in power can never be defeated at the polls. It is a truth of history that power never voluntarily abdicates. A just law, it has been said, is one that makes it easy to do right and hard to do wrong. Indeed, by this standard the Walton law, which surrounds the constable with temptation, clothes him with arbitrary power, and shields him from exposure, is unjust. The two leading parties of Virginia are the Democratic and the Republican. The party in power is Democratic. So far as the evidence goes in this case, there was not a single Republican special constable appointed in the district. We call attention to the moral impossibility for any partisan, through whom a large proportion of the votes are to be cast, to act without bias. He can never be indifferent to the fact that his appointment was not an accident. Passion never rises higher than during a political campaign. Men are willing to risk their lives for success. Carriages are pressed into service and invalids are taken from their beds in inclement weather and driven miles away to the voting precinct. The value of a single vote is emphasized by every tongue, and men are reminded that Jefferson was made President by a single vote. Let us, in imagination, visit the polls at the supreme moment of an election in Virginia under the Walton law.

The storm has been gathering for weeks and months, and now its unruly waters break like a sea around the ballot box. Crowds of men, those who have voted and those who are eager to vote, gather like a raging tempest. In the center of this maelstrom stands the special constable, the one central figure. The spot he occupies is the Gibraltar of the situation. The path of every illiterate voter leads up to him. Between the elector and the ballot box stands this omnipotent sentinel, and the first word of challenge is, "Who do you intend to vote for?" If he refuses to answer, he can go no farther, and he is disfranchised. If he answers, and votes, he can never know whether his vote was for or against his own candidate. In truth, he has not voted, but another has. If any mistake is made, it can never be corrected; if any fraud is practiced, it can never be detected; for the same law that compels the voter to divulge his secret secludes both him and his confessor from the eyes of the world, and leaves them alone while the clumsy hand of the bewildered man blindly executes the will of his master. One hundred and ten thousand Virginia voters depend upon the competency, integrity, and honor of the special constable, and above all upon his strength of character to be unmoved by his irresistible surroundings. But we are not left alone to the imagination, or rather to the obvious import of the law, however clear its light may be, for we can go to the Virginia polls in person and view the workings of this law in the light of the evidence in this case.

The evidence will show—

1. That the "special constable" tried to influence voters.
2. That persons who voted were not sure for whom they had voted.
3. That the constable failed to perform his duty.
4. That many would not vote because they had to vote through another man.
5. That the constable marked ballots so they would be thrown out.
6. That the constables and boards were Democrats.

J. A. Burnett, of Patrick County, 31 years of age, a farmer (record, page 26):

Q. Did anyone try to influence you to vote in the last election?
A. On the last election here I walked up and got my ticket to vote and came out with it and was looking at the ticket for or against the amendment to the constitution, and while I was fixing it he (the special constable) took the other one and filled it out for Swanson without asking me anything about it, and offered it back to me to vote, and I asked him why he had fixed my ticket. His answer was, that he thought I voted the Democratic ticket. I turned and walked back to Dr. Via and asked him for another ticket.
Q. Why do you suppose the constable or vote fixer thus treated you, if you knew?
A. Well, I suppose it was because he thought I could not read or write.

Steve Anderson, says 58 or 59 years, long in there somewhere; live over here this side the standpipe, this side of Henry Cousins (record, page 46):

4. Q. Did you vote in the election between Cornett and Swanson last fall? If so, where did you vote?
A. I did; in Martinsville here at the precinct.
5. Q. For whom did you intend to vote?
A. Mr. Cornett.
6. Q. Did you actually vote for him?
A. I don't know whether I voted for him or not; I didn't know which was his name and the other two candidates; and the man that gave me the ticket I told him that my aim was to vote for Mr. Cornett, and I asked him to mark out the other two candidates' names, and he marked out two, and I put my finger and asked him whose name was that, and he said it was Mr. Cornett's. I told him he was the one I was going to vote for, and that was one of the names; and he said he misunderstood me, and he says: "Take that ticket and carry it back and get you another," and I done so. Well, I asked him then to mark out all of the names there but Mr. Cornett's. There was some other gentleman back at the ballot box says: "Let him do his own marking; you has no right to mark out for no one." And I says: "Show me Mr. Cornett's name and I will mark out the others." And he says: "Do your own marking." Well, I done so, but who I voted for I can not tell for certain.

Wall Starling, 73 years old (record, page 47):

2 Q. Did you vote at the election for Congressman last fall? If so, where? And go on and tell where you voted and just what occurred to you at the election.
A. Yes, sir; here at the court-house; I went in; Mr. Dyer he told me to go to Mr. Penn Watson and git my ticket, and Mr. Penn Watson gave me two and said, "Which one will you take?" and he handed me one to carry back, and say, "See, talk fast, Uncle Wall; you haven't got long to stay," and where he put the ticket I can't tell; I told him I wanted to vote a Republican ticket out and out.
3 Q. Did anyone mark any names of the candidates on the ticket?
A. Not as I knows of.
4 Q. Did you see anyone mark on it after it came into your sight?
A. Nor, sir.
5 Q. Did you mark out any of the names on the ticket?
A. Nor, sir.
6 Q. Did you hand it back to the judges without any of the names on it being marked out?
A. Had no names marked at all.

Riley Parker (record, page 48):

RILEY PARKER, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by ATTORNEY FOR CONTESTANT:

1 Q. Your age and where do you live?
A. About 59 years old, and live in Martinsville, Va.
2 Q. Can you read and write?
A. No, sir.
3 Q. Where are you a registered voter?
A. At Martinsville, Henry County, Va.
4 Q. Did you vote at the election for Congressman last fall, November 6, 1894?
A. No, sir.
5 Q. Why not?
A. I was not here; I went to hauling wood in the morning, and as I come on back I met several of them colored—Dennis Haiston was one that I knowed; they was a telling me how they was a voting; kept on hauling all day, till the evening I went up to where they went into the court-house—the door—and Sam Travis was there. I asked him what way did he vote; he said it was Mr. Dyer was there, and I says, "Well, did you know how you voted?" He says, "Nor, I didn't, I didn't." I spoke to him, "Come on and less go down, cause I can't read, and I ain't satisfied to vote that way."
6. Q. What was it that made you dissatisfied with that way of voting?
A. Well, I couldn't read, and I didn't know whether they would mark out the right one or not.
7 Q. For whom did you wish to vote?
A. Cornett.

W. P. Adkins, 53 years old, a carpenter (record, pages 90, 91, and 63). All the officers of election at Dry Ford precinct were Democrats. They used for a ballot box an old cigar box. The number of votes polled was 111.

Q. How many voted for Cornett?
A. There were 64 men came to me and asked me to set their names down, that they had voted for Cornett, which with myself made 65. I file the list, Exhibit Adkins.
(Answer is objected to as being hearsay and not competent to contradict the election returns, by contestee.)
280 Q. Please state how it was you came to keep this tally sheet.
(Objected to as irrelevant by same.)
A. The Republicans in that vicinity had become dissatisfied at the returns from that precinct; they didn't think they were getting justice, and came to me and asked me to keep account of all Republican votes that day. I would not put a man's name down until he voted. I told them to go and vote and come and tell me, and I put their names down as they told me.
(Answer objected to as hearsay, and otherwise illegal, by same.)
281 Q. What majority and for whom were the returns from that precinct by the judges of election?
(Objected to; the best evidence is a duly authenticated copy from the returns, by same.)
A. I have seen an official copy of the poll books; they gave Swanson 68 and Cornett 43; that gives Swanson a majority of 25 votes.
(Answer objected to by same.)

B. L. Hutchinson, 49 years old, a farmer (record, page 92):

303 Q. Where and for whom did you vote at the November election, 1894?
A. At Dry Fork; for Cornett.
304 Q. Examine Exhibit "Adkins" I now hand you, and state whether or not the men whose names appear on that tally sheet you saw approach Mr. Adkins and request him to take down their names, they having voted for G. W. Cornett.
(Objected to as asking for hearsay and not pertinent to any issue here.)
A. Yes; they are correct. I saw them when they came to him. I was standing by his side.
305 Q. For whom did these men tell Mr. Adkins they voted?
(Same objection.)
A. They told him they voted for Mr. Cornett. I know all these men, and can call them when I see them face to face, except one or two colored men.
(Answer objected to by contestee.)
307 Q. Please state whether it was the request of a great number of Republicans of Dry Fork precinct that a list of names should be kept of the Republicans voting for G. W. Cornett, by Mr. Adkins, they fearing that they would be defrauded of their ballots, and that they would be counted contrary to the way they were cast.
(Objected to as asking for hearsay, and immaterial to any matter in issue, and otherwise illegal, by contestee.)
A. Yes, sir; he was so requested.

B. W. Jackson, 70 years old, minister of the gospel (record, pages 94 and 95):

333 Q. What position, if any, did you hold at the election, November, 1894, at the Stokesland precinct?
A. I was one of the judges.
334 Q. How many ballots were thrown out as being improperly marked at that precinct?
A. About 150; that's what I counted.
335 Q. Please state how these rejected ballots were marked and whose names were marked, if you know.
A. The charge was that they wasn't marked over three-fourths of the name; the names marked or scratched were Mr. Swanson, Mr. Hale, and Mr. Shelton.
336 Q. Was Cornett's name left unmarked on about all of these ballots?
A. Yes; on every one.
337 Q. What was done with these ballots thus rejected?
A. They were destroyed.
338 Q. At whose request?
A. At the instance of the other two judges. I asked them not to do it.
339 Q. Why did you not want it done?
A. The reason I didn't want them destroyed at once, because the constable marked them all, and I thought he ought to be held responsible, and I told them we might need them for reference.
340 Q. What were the politics of the officers of election at that precinct?

A. Two of the judges were Democrats and all the other officers of the election were Democrats except me.

341 Q. Who is the registrar, and his politics, at Stokesland precinct?

A. Mr. Paul Chatelin; a Democrat.

W. T. Thomas; aged, 31; farmer (record, page 96):

369 Q. Did you vote at the November election, 1894? If so, for whom and where?

A. I did; for Cornett, at Design.

370 Q. State whether or not anyone tried to influence you in casting your vote then and there.

A. As I went to the polls to vote Mr. Eperson asked me who I wanted to vote for. I told him Mr. Cornett. He (the constable) asked me did I want him to scratch for me. I told him yes, and when he scratched he scratched all the names off the ticket except Swanson's, and he (the constable) handed me my ticket. I looked at it and I found he didn't scratch it right. He left Mr. Swanson on there instead of Mr. Cornett; and I says, "I want you to correct this," and he took it and looked at it and said, "Oh, yes; I will correct it," and tore it in two and put it down on the ground under his foot. I tried to pick it up to show the people I was not mistaken in what he tried to do. He said, "You can't carry any tickets out from here," and he gave me another ticket.

R. E. Keen, aged 36, floor manager in tobacco factory (record, page 97):

383 Q. State the politics of all the officers, including judges, constable, and clerks of the election at that precinct at November election, 1894.

A. Democrats.

384 Q. Did you vote at that precinct at that election?

A. Yes, sir.

385 Q. Was T. H. McDearman a judge at that precinct at that election?

A. Yes, sir.

386 Q. Is he the same T. H. McDearman who stands indicted in the United States district court in Danville, Va., for frauds in previous elections?

A. Yes, sir.

387 Q. Go on and tell the manner fully in which the election at Design precinct at November, 1894, was conducted.

A. That morning myself and T. H. McDearman stretched a line 40 feet from the poll; that all had to go over that line to vote. After about three-quarters of an hour the white people goes around the house and come to the poll. I called the constable's attention to it; as the line was struck I thought it was right that white and colored both should divide by that line. Sometimes there was 4 and 5 at the polls. He, the constable, then marks the tickets wrong. I called his attention to the fact that they were wrong. He then told me that he could not mark them. I then told him if he would allow me I would scratch them in his presence and give every voter a ticket which he wanted. The constable says he would go in the house and see the judges; he left and came back and said all was willing but T. H. McDearman. I then told him that the majority, I thought, ruled. He, the constable, says to me that T. H. McDearman was the boss over them. He, the constable, also stated that the tickets which he marked wrong were through mistake. I then told the constable that I was afraid his mistakes had been going on all day; and at night when the poll was closed I was called in the house to see the ballots counted and we found 38 tickets folded two together, making 76. I also asked T. H. McDearman what objection did he have in my marking the tickets. He said, "None." I then told him that the constable said that he objected. He then spoke in the house, in the presence of the other judges, that it was a "damned lie;" that there was nothing said about me marking tickets to him; so far as he cared "he didn't give a damn who marked, Swanson would go to Congress."

388 Q. How many colored men voted there that day, and how many white men?

A. One hundred and seventy-nine colored and 123 white.

389 Q. In whose favor was the majority of ballots returned there that day?

A. In Swanson's; 52 majority over Cornett.

390 Q. For whom did the colored voters at that precinct vote that day, and how do you know?

A. For Cornett; they would call for Cornett as soon as they got over the line, and when they voted they told me so, and I put it down.

391 Q. Did all the colored men get to vote that day that were there?

A. Yes, sir; I think so.

From the contestee's evidence we note the following:

Walter Coles, jr., chairman of the electoral board of Pittsylvania County (record, page 118):

1 Q. State who compose the electoral board of Pittsylvania County.

A. Walter Coles, jr., chairman; J. H. Bolanz, secretary, and G. W. Ramsey.

2 Q. What are their political affiliations?

A. I am a Democrat; the others are both Democrats, also.

3 Q. In appointing judges of election, how many Democrats were appointed at a precinct?

A. We aimed to appoint two at each precinct. In many cases we did not know what the politics of the ones appointed were. We also took some names from the lists furnished us by the Republicans and Populists, and afterwards found that they were Democrats.

4 Q. What was the political faith of the constables appointed at each precinct?

A. They were Democrats.

J. H. Bolanz, a member of the electoral board, says (record, page 119):

Q. What was the political faith of the constables appointed for each precinct to act at said election?

A. Democratic, with the exception of about eight.

What the political faith of those eight was he does not state.

George W. Ramsey, a member of the electoral board, says (record, page 120):

Q. What was the political faith of the constables appointed at each precinct?

A. I can not tell you.

John G. Friend, member of the electoral board of the city of Danville (record, page 126):

Q. What was the political faith of the electoral board of the city of Danville which appointed officers to hold the election on the 6th of November, 1894?

A. Democrats.

Q. What was the political faith of the special constables appointed for the several wards at said election?

A. Democrats.

J. T. Orgain (record, page 131) says two of the judges were Democrats and the other, Mr. Johnson, belongs to the negro party, and that the special constable was a Democrat.

B. F. Jefferson, member of the electoral board of Neapolis (record, page 144):

Q. What was the political faith of the electoral board who appointed judges and special constables for the city of Neapolis?

A. They were sound, pure Democrats.

And, lastly, to close his proofs, the contestee brings one Moore, apparently the only special constable in the entire district who was willing to place himself in a position to be cross-examined.

J. E. Moore, aged 30, a special constable (record, page 145):

Q. Please state whether or not you refused or failed in any way, so far as you know, to help any illiterate voter who asked for your assistance.

A. In every case I discharged my duties in accordance with the law.

In addition to the above, Mr. Young says (record, page 10):

Twenty-seven ballots were thrown out in my precinct because they were blotted in folding.

Mr. Hale says (record, page 14):

Every constable in my county was a strong Democrat.

Mr. Morgan says (record, page 19):

It was the general belief that the Walton law was intended to keep the present party in power.

C. H. Ross, chairman of the county Democrats, says (record, page 27):

Most constables were Democrats; some had no politics.

Mr. Sowder (record, page 107) says:

Forty-two ballots were not counted because they had other marks than the lines.

Mr. Speaker, it is the policy of this Republic to extend and encourage the use of the elective franchise. Any law that deters, discourages, and hinders its use is destructive of the democratic principles of government. The Walton law, by clothing an officer of election with arbitrary power, by destroying the secrecy of the ballot, and by establishing a qualification in contravention of the constitution of the State, can not be upheld and enforced without the most serious consequences to our free institutions. A law which enables an officer to mislead voters, to falsely prepare ballots, to change the vote of a whole precinct, and to know the contents of ballots before they are cast is too dangerous to be upheld and too destructive to constitutional rights to be tolerated in American statute books.

By comparing the Walton election law with the law which it was intended to supersede, it will be observed that the supreme object of the new law had reference to the illiterate voters. It is true the law by its terms applied alike to the literate and illiterate, but in its application and effect it was radically different. The two laws were alike in veiling with profound secrecy the order in which the names of candidates were placed on the ballot; they were alike in providing the booth where the elector was to prepare his ballot; they were alike in limiting the time for voting to two minutes and a half, and they were alike in permitting the voter to deposit his ballot in the presence of the judges. Had all the voters been literate, there would have been no distinction as to parties in the application of the later law. But each ballot contained the names of all the rival candidates, and this new feature made it necessary for each voter to know where on the list the name of his candidate was to be found. Every educated voter acquired this knowledge by simply reading his ballot; every illiterate voter was helpless in the presence of a sudden necessity. The law which created this necessity compelled the illiterate voter to surrender his constitutional right to cast a secret ballot or be disfranchised.

What created this necessity? If it was the ignorance of the man, then it was his misfortune, of which he had no right to complain. But it did not exist under the old law; therefore it was not his ignorance, but the operation of the law which created the necessity, and this destroyed a constitutional right. The old election law permitted each political party to have a separate ballot containing only the names of its party candidates. Every illiterate elector could provide himself with one of these ballots before the day of election; could counsel with any person or friend he chose with reference to it, and finally cast a vote which he had every reason to believe expressed his political wish and which at least was absolutely secret. If he voted the ballot without change, he had the assurance that it was for the party of his choice. If he made any changes on the ticket, he had the satisfaction of knowing that in its preparation he had admitted no one to his confidence except the friends he was willing to trust.

Let us, then, consider in what manner this Walton law made it necessary for a legal voter to divulge to a stranger the name of the candidate for whom he desired to vote. It was done by withholding from him a fact the knowledge of which could have done no possible harm; a fact which every voter in Virginia had a right to know before he entered the voting booth; a fact which every illiterate voter must know in order to cast an intelligent and secret ballot; a fact which in Michigan and in other States is by law posted in public places for the information of all voters, namely, the locality of every candidate on the official ballot. Why did Virginia withhold from her voters this essential information? Was it to guard against forgery? There were other means more effective than this which invaded no man's rights.

The quality and size of the paper and type, the art of lithographing, and, above all, the official seal, which by this law was stamped on the back of each official ballot, rendered successful forgery impossible.

There could have been but one reason for this provision, and that was to have the illiterate voter bound hand and foot and cast into the hands of a partisan official who was clothed with the power to do with his vote as he saw fit. The Virginia court, in their dictum, say with great plausibility:

> The general scheme of the law is to secure the independence of the voter by secluding him within an isolated booth, surrounded by a neutral zone, within which none may enter save those charged with conducting the election. * * * The object is to relieve the voter from influences inimical to a free and deliberate exercise of the right of suffrage, to free him from all solicitation and annoyance, and to leave him a perfectly free agent to vote as to him seems best.

The question which this reasoning inevitably suggests in every mind is, How would this zone of neutrality, this ideal seclusion, this refuge of independence, have been disturbed if the voter carried with him into the voting booth a knowledge of the order of the names on the ballot? This, we think, would be a difficult question for either the legislature or supreme court of Virginia to answer. On the other hand, it would have increased his security by destroying even the constable's excuse for entering, and it certainly would have enveloped the zone of neutrality in an atmosphere of independence.

We are therefore of the opinion that this law is unreasonable, and therefore unconstitutional, because it withholds from the voter a timely and necessary knowledge of the arrangement of the names of candidates on a mixed and consolidated ballot.

The illiterate voters of the State were intelligent enough to prepare their own ballots if they were left with the ordinary means of learning for themselves where the names of their candidates were on the official ballot. The effect of the law was to deprive them of this right. Certainly the ability to count and understand numbers well enough to buy and sell and make change in business, which the illiterate universally possess in this land, is not a qualification to be ignored, and can not be made unavailable by a State legislature. A just law should always supplement and assist, but never hinder and defeat a citizen.

That this law is calculated to disqualify the illiterate citizen is manifest in the recent election, and is made plain by the evidence in this case.

W. L. Penn, aged 60 years, and member of the electoral board of Henry County, testifies (record, pages 41 and 42):

> I superintended the printing of the tickets for Henry County; some of Swanson's friends suggested it would be better to print the names of the candidates on the ticket in varied and alternate positions. They thought it would be preferable in order that the voters might not get them by rote. Swanson's friends suggested to have the tickets printed this way to me individually when I went to have the tickets printed.

Ed. H. Davis, printer and publisher of the Grayson Gazette (record, page 110), says:

Q. State whether you set the type and made up the form from which the tickets were printed under the supervision of the electoral board of Grayson County, which said tickets were used in Grayson County in the election held the 6th day of November, 1894, for Congressman, Fifth district of Virginia.

A. I did.

Q. Please state how many candidates' names were printed on said tickets, the order in which they were printed, and describe said tickets fully.

A. Four names: C. A. Swanson, G. W. Cornett, G. W. B. Hale, and —— Shelton. I can't give the order in which they came on the tickets, but they were not all in the same order.

Q. In how many different forms were said tickets printed?

A. I set six different forms, and the names were alternate in each form; that is, as I now remember it, the names did not come in the same order on any of said six forms.

Q. How many tickets were printed for Grayson County?

A. Five thousand.

Q. Then, as I understand it, there were about 833 tickets on which the names of the candidates appeared in the same order, and six lots of tickets of about that number; is that correct?

A. The statement is correct except that the different forms were not kept separate after being printed.

Q. Were they or not mixed up before being distributed to the different precincts of the county so as to include in the lot for each precinct tickets of the six different forms?

A. They were. The six different forms of tickets were printed on a single sheet at a time, and after all the tickets were printed they were counted out in sheets for each precinct, and then cut separate, making the required number of tickets for each precinct.

Q. By whose direction or by what authority did you set up and print said tickets in six different forms?

A. I don't know; the chairman of the board, E. F. S. Cox, was present and knew that they were being printed in six different forms. I also read a letter from the secretary of the Commonwealth to the chairman of the board, giving to said chairman the names of the candidates for Congress, from which letter I gathered that there was no special form required by law for said tickets.

Q. How came you, then, to set up and print said tickets in different forms with the names of the candidates in alternate positions thereon?

A. I had been told that it could be done, and I wanted to set six forms anyway, and really did not notice which names came first on the different forms.

Q. Who had told you this?

A. G. C. Porterfield, for one; I don't now remember any others certainly.

Q. According to your best recollection at the present time, who else suggested it to you?

A. I think perhaps J. A. Dickey did.

Q. What position did he at that time hold in the Democratic party of Grayson County?

A. County chairman.

Q. Was not G. C. Porterfield at that time editor of the Grayson Gazette, and a warm supporter of C. A. Swanson, the Democratic nominee at said election?

A. He was.

Q. Was it or not from the information obtained from the reading of the letter from the secretary of the Commonwealth or by the direction of the electoral board that caused you to set up six different forms for printing the tickets?

A. I can not say that it was either; if the chairman had directed me to change them I would have done so.

Q. You having decided to set up six different forms, why did you not set them all alike?

A. As I said before, I had gathered from what I had heard that it did not make any difference, and I did not try to get them alike.

Q. From this information received, did you or not set up these different forms suggested to you by C. A. Swanson's supporters in order that he might profit by the same?

A. If there could be any profit derived from it, I did, but I could not see that there would be any in it.

J. A. Dickey, merchant, Democratic chairman for Grayson County (record, page 111):

Q. For what reason was it that the tickets printed for use at said election in this county had the names of the four candidates for Congressman in varied and alternate positions thereon?

A. I thought if there was any advantage in it that the Democrats would be gainers by it, and I did not suppose there was any law against printing the tickets as stated.

John C. Taylor, aged 51 years, farmer (record, page 112), lives in Grayson County:

Q. For whom did you vote at said election?

A. I voted for Geo. W. Cornett.

Q. What was the position of his name on the ticket you voted?

A. Last, or at the bottom.

Q. Did you advise any illiterate voter after you voted as to the place Cornett's name occupied on the ticket and instruct him to mark his ticket according to the position you found the names on the ticket you voted?

A. I told Bob and Dave Day how my ticket was, and that if the tickets were all alike for them to mark out the three top ones—that Cornett's name was at the bottom.

Q. For whom did they wish to vote?

A. They said they wanted to vote for Cornett.

Q. At that time did you know that the names on the tickets varied?

A. I did not.

John H. Carrico, aged 25, law student, of Independence, Grayson County (record, page 113):

Q. State whether or not you have read and studied the Walton election law.

A. I have.

Q. Taking into consideration that all the constables appointed were Democrats, under the operation of the Walton law, under which the Congressional election in 1894 was held, could an illiterate Republican vote intelligently without letting the Democratic constable know for whom he voted?

A. Don't think he could.

Q. What is the politics of the electoral board of Grayson County?

A. Democratic.

Q. What is the political faith of the special constables appointed by that board for this county?

A. They are all Democrats that I know, and I know all but two.

Q. For whom did you vote at the election on November 6, 1894, and what position did his name occupy on the ticket?

A. For G. W. Cornett, and his name was third on the ticket.

Q. Please state whether or not you advised illiterate voters that they would find G. W. Cornett's name third on the ticket.

A. I did.

L. S. Thomas, judge of election, Henry County (record, page 37):

5 Q. State the order in which the names of the candidates occurred on the tickets furnished by the judges to the electors at said precinct under the terms of the law under which the election was held, known as the Walton law.

A. Mr. Swanson's name appeared first; I don't recall the order in which the others appeared.

6 Q. State whether the names of the other three candidates appeared in regular order on the ticket, or did they appear in alternate and varied positions?

A. On many of the tickets they were in regular order, and on many they alternated and appeared in irregular order.

J. B. Dunn, judge of election, Henry County (record, page 41):

4 Q. What was the vote polled at your precinct, and what counted?

A. Three hundred and forty-five was polled and 74 thrown out.

5 Q. State whether the names of the candidates appeared in regular order on all the tickets handed out to electors at that place on that date, or did the names appear in varied and alternate positions? Please describe the tickets fully in that respect.

A. The names were irregular on the tickets; they all didn't occupy the same position on the ticket.

6 Q. Please describe the tickets that were not counted, and declared invalid by the judges.

A. They was marked different ways; scratched different ways.

7 Q. How did the vote at that precinct stand in reference to the different candidates? Please give the number counted for each of the different candidates.

A. I disremember the exact number of each candidate's tickets. I think there was over 200 for Swanson and a hundred and some odd for Cornett, and a few for each of the other two candidates.

8 Q. Prior to this, had that precinct usually given Republican or Democratic majority; which?

A. It had usually given a majority for the Republicans, I think.

9 Q. What was the cause, then, of a majority being returned for the Democratic candidate at the last election; to what do you attribute the same?

A. I don't know as I know.
10 Q. State whether the result would have been the same had the vote been taken under the old law?
A. I don't think it would.
11 Q. Who was the loser at that precinct by the operation of the Walton law at the last election?
A. If it was left for me to decide, I should say Cornett was the loser.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the secrecy attending the printing and sealed distribution of the ballots would have been valueless if the order of the names had been uniform, for any man who voted first in the morning could communicate his knowledge to all succeeding voters. Every illiterate colored man in Virginia could learn in five minutes how to prepare his own ballot if he knew the number of his candidate on the list. But the Walton law meant that he should not know this fact, and the Democratic party in power meant to make it absolutely unknowable by mixing up the names in different order. A very natural question arises, Why this anxiety? The only rational answer is, To drive the illiterate voter to the special constable.

This law is a new departure in American legislation. The Australian ballot system, of which the Walton law is claimed to be an adaptation, had for its object, first, to secure the secrecy of the ballot; second, to secure a free and untrammeled vote; and third, to secure a correct return of the ballots cast; and in all of the States of the Union, from Michigan, which was the first, to Pennsylvania, which is the last to adopt the system, it has invariably been regarded as essential, in placing all candidates on one ballot, to afford electors unusual facilities and advantages to learn before the election the exact order of the names on the ballot. Some States require that the names shall be printed in alphabetical order; some that the candidate of the party having the largest majority in the preceding election shall come first, and so on through the list, and that this ballot shall be published in two newspapers of opposing parties. Can it be possible that the opposite of what is essential in all other States can be deemed reasonable in the State of Virginia? And since the nation at large is interested in these State election laws, not only so far as the members of this House are concerned, but in the executive branch, which is to be chosen by electors who are voted for by the people, it becomes of momentous importance to the nation that all forms of election laws should be just and reasonable.

One fact must be kept constantly in mind in this discussion, and that is, the right of secrecy in voting is as much a constitutional right as the right to vote itself. Therefore an election law which trenches upon one is as void as though it trenched upon the other. Suppose a law provided that the ballot box should be kept in a room into which no man should enter but the judge of election, and that when the voter handed in his ballot the judge was to immediately retire and deposit the ballot, out of the presence of the voter; this would certainly be unconstitutional as infringing upon the right of the voter to personally cast his ballot. This personal right can not be limited or qualified. So it is with reference to the right of secrecy. The moment it is communicated to one person it is no longer a secret. The right is destroyed as completely as though it was communicated to a hundred or a thousand. It is a secret only while it is locked in the chamber of a man's own consciousness. Before the law a secret admits of no degree of comparison. As Judge Cooley has said, the right of secrecy is an impenetrable veil which can not be raised save by the voter himself.

But it is said that the illiterate voter must confide his secret to some one. This is not true. The difficulty with this proposition is that it assumes that because a man is compelled to ask for information concerning his ballot that he necessarily discloses the contents of the ballot. It would not in law raise even a presumption that because I inquired about a ticket I therefore voted it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LACEY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understand that my colleague has nearly concluded his remarks. I ask unanimous consent that he may have leave to finish them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, but suppose an illiterate man was obliged to disclose the secret of his ballot in order to vote, is it a matter of indifference whether he selects the confidant or whether the law appoints one? Is this true of any of the secrets which the law in its mercy permits a man to keep or bestow between husband and wife, physician and patient, or lawyer and client? If it is, then the right of secrecy which is intended to nurture confidence and insure protection is indeed a snare and a delusion. No; the right to keep or bestow a secret is a personal prerogative. It is an inalienable right for which there is no substitute and no equivalent. Divorced from the will of man, it can have no existence. No oath of another is sacred enough to guard it; no bond strong enough to indemnify it. To say it shall be surrendered to a constable is to destroy it.

THE EFFECT OF THE UNCONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS OF THE WALTON LAW.

It is claimed that the unconstitutionality of certain provisions of the Walton law are not so essential as to invalidate the election.

Let us consider the essentiality of these provisions. In the first place, every illiterate voter is directly affected by them, for every one, without a single exception, is compelled to vote through another person appointed by this law.

According to the United States census of 1890 there were 378,000 voters in Virginia, of which 247,000 are white and 138,000 are colored. Of the colored voters 57 per cent, or more than one-half, are illiterate, and of the white voters 14 per cent, or about one-seventh, are illiterate, making in round numbers not less than 110,000, or about one-third, of the voters of Virginia who are illiterate. By this law every one of these voters is kept in total ignorance of the character of the ballot until two and one-half minutes before he is required to deposit it, and during these two and a half minutes he is shut out from all communication with the world, with no possible means of preparing his ballot save through the assistance of one person appointed by the law, and who may or may not be trustworthy, in the opinion of the voter, and who was in every instance, as disclosed by the evidence in this case, a political enemy, whose information and assistance no man living can assail or impeach or in any manner inquire into.

And yet we are told this is not essential, and is immaterial. Perhaps some gentleman will be kind enough to inform us what provisions of the law are essential.

But we are told that testimony in this case was taken only in 12 out of the entire 144 precincts of the district, and that although the injustice of the law is shown in these 12 precincts, the presumption must be that in the remaining 132 precincts the election was fairly conducted and that the unimpeached returns must be taken as conclusive. This will not do. In the first place, it appears that the election in all the precincts was conducted under the same law which worked the injustice in the precincts which were investigated.

In the next place, this evidence was taken not in one only, but in five out of the entire seven counties of the district.

In the third place, the object of this testimony was not to impeach the returns, but to show the inherent character and nullity of the law.

For these reasons the presumption which arises is that what is known to have happened in one precinct happened in all, since like causes produce like results. Moreover, it is a safe inference in every department of human investigation from a part of a homogeneous whole to infer the nature of the whole.

And yet we repeat what we have already said, the object of the evidence was to show the nature and workings of the law and its inherent nullity, not to impeach the election of actual fraud.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does the gentleman think that it is within the purview of the House of Representatives to set aside the statute of a State on the ground that it is unconstitutional when the courts of that State have decided that it is constitutional?

Mr. THOMAS. I have so argued in my remarks. I am satisfied in my mind that I am right that they have the right; in fact, not only the right, but it is their duty.

Mr. Speaker, I champion to-day the cause of 100,000 Virginia voters, bound hand and foot in political bondage, with no outlook or hope for the future. If my contention shall fail, a republican form of government will cease to exist in Virginia.

Startling as this statement is, it is but half the truth, for if voters can be disfranchised in one State with impunity, they may be disfranchised in all States, and thus a destructive precedent may overthrow liberty itself.

If a mode of election can be contrived that will embarrass and disqualify one class of voters, then it is possible for some mode of election to be devised that will disqualify any class to whom the Constitution has extended the right of suffrage.

It was well that this contest should take place on Virginia soil. Here where the first English settlement in America was planted; here where a Henry sounded the first notes of liberty; here where the author of the Declaration of Independence lived and died; where Washington and Lee were born, the former to exemplify the love for a nation, the other to exemplify the love for a State, and both to exemplify their devotion to the cause of mankind and to a republican form of government.

It is well, I say, that on the historic soil of the Old Dominion State this new and novel and portentous issue in the cause of popular government should be fought and settled.

Perhaps no State of inferior rank would have attempted this master stroke of ingenuity to establish the supremacy of a minority. Nor would I directly or even by innuendo disparage this minority. If it were possible for me to believe in the supremacy of any minority, it would be in the illustrious descendants of the pioneers of civil liberty who have for centuries made the banks of the James, the Rappahannock, the Shenandoah, and the Potomac sacred to home, to Christianity, to liberty, and to civilization.

But my faith is pledged for humanity, not for heredity.

The morning light is breaking not for the few, but for the many. The humblest descendant of the menial slave who was never blessed with a surname is to-day invested with the royal title of manhood and bears in his right hand the scepter of sovereignty. The new order may and doubtless does embarrass some. Traditions commend the past and apprehensions overcast the future. But standing in the midst of these new conditions it is not hard to perceive the inevitable trend of evolution. A wise statesmanship must be content to shape and direct, not to destroy that which is irresistible.

He, therefore, who stands by the least of American electors stands by the greatest. In the defense of the whole no part will be neglected or injured.

It would have been both an honor and a pleasure to have presented my report as the judgment of the majority of the committee. Such a hope might naturally have been indulged in in view of the history, principles, and traditions of the Republican party. It was this party which presided over the infancy of the New South, that was instrumental in shaping its organic laws, and is to-day rewarded by that universal evidence of prosperity which spreads from the Ohio to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Rio Grande.

When responsibility is once assumed, there is no safe point for cessation or abandonment.

The Committee on Elections No. 3 is composed of 9 members, 6 Republicans and 3 Democrats. When the vote was taken in the committee, the majority was composed of the 3 Democrats and 2 Republicans. Mr. JONES, a Democratic member from Virginia, prepared the majority report.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit me another question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I will ask the gentleman, if the argument he has made were followed out, would not such a policy destroy a republican form of government? Is it not a matter that the judiciary are to decide whether the election law of a State is constitutional, and after it has been ascertained and decided by the judiciary, can the gentleman cite a precedent in former Congresses that this House, either expressly or impliedly, declared the law of a State unconstitutional that had been declared constitutional by the State courts?

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman had shown me the courtesy to follow my remarks, he would have gone over this ground with me. I have hardly time to go back over it at the present time.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. THOMAS. I am nearly through.

Mr. JENKINS. And that is, by virtue of what right does he appear upon the floor here speaking in reference to the private matters that took place in the committee? And inasmuch as the gentleman has seen fit to mention me by name, I desire to say that he entirely and totally misrepresents me.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not a private matter. In the first place, the report of the minority is signed by three Republican members. It goes without saying, that all the rest of the committee assent to the majority report. If this was a secret, why, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I supposed that was a matter of general notoriety and was perfectly proper.

That this report is acquiesced in by all the Democratic members may be pardonable, but it is a matter of regret that prominent Republicans, whose political education and local environments would naturally have led them to espouse the cause of the weak and illiterate, have not been able to see through the thin gauze of Democratic methods which has persuaded them to array themselves against the disfranchised thousands of the State of Virginia. Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, as well as Michigan, were among the first to place in the hands of the emancipated South the ballot of American freemen; and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania and Michigan should be the last to stand unmoved when artful diplomacy seeks by indirection to do that which if directly attempted would arouse universal indignation.

For Michigan let me say that when 90,000 of her sons bore the Union flag through the valleys and over the mountains of the South, when, on the march and in the field and in the hospital, they sorely needed a friend, the friend of the hour, the one who could be trusted even with life itself, who often took the place of brother and sister and father and mother, was the emancipated slave. [Applause.]

And standing here to-day, the least of her Representatives in this House, I voice the sentiments of her people, Democratic and Republican alike, when I say that in the struggle for a free ballot between the voters of Virginia and the political machine that disfranchises them Michigan is for the inviolability of the ballot.

A secret ballot is the palladium of civil liberty. It gives to suffrage at once its glory and its power. Around it gathers the peace and security of society. Before it opens the grand perspective of our elective system. The Walton law of Virginia is the first legislative attempt to invade and overthrow it. Let it be the last. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise not for the purpose of participating in the particular matters involved in the controversy arising out of the present contested-election case, but to advert briefly to some remarks from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] while discussing the case of Yost against Tucker a few days ago. On that occasion the gentleman said:

> We have for years here attempted to build up the Republican party in the South by seating this man and that man and by patronage; and the result is that they display their chief vitality and strength in our national Republican conventions, where they generally appear with as many different delegations as there are candidates for the Presidency. I say, what the Republicans of the South now need is to be treated upon robust principles. They have been coddled to the point of destruction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the first place, allow me to say that there is nothing in the record of the case of Yost against Tucker that called for these animadversions upon the Republicans of the South. There was no excuse and no provocation for this assault. In that very case the Republicans of the South seemed to divide somewhat, one of the Republicans from the State of Maryland [Mr. COFFIN] having voted for the majority report to deny a seat to Mr. Yost, the contestant. The fact is, upon all these contested-election cases from the South, the Southern Republicans have divided more or less, and in at least one case a number of them refused to vote, not being satisfied that the Southern Republican contestant was entitled to the seat. We do not come here like a clan, ready always to vote for the Southern Republican contestant, right or wrong. We have displayed a large amount of liberality and impartiality in voting upon these Southern contested-election cases, as an examination of the record will attest. The Republicans of the South want no "coddling." They want no partiality. They want no special favors. All they want is to have justice done them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am grateful for the argument made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] who has just taken his seat, because he has portrayed to this House the perils, the difficulties, the obstructions, and the hindrances through which a Republican of the South must pass before he has a chance to deposit in the ballot box the verdict of his heart upon a political contest pending. In many cases it is a surrender of social privileges; in many cases it means probable bankruptcy in his business; in some cases it means danger of bodily injury; and in almost all cases it means a frown from those who stand highest in social and business circles; and yet, in spite of all these things, in spite of adverse surroundings, in spite of business dangers, in spite of social proscription, in spite of ostracism, the Republican party has held to its organization in the Southern States; and in the election just gone by we have rolled up an increase in the Republican vote greater than in several other sections of our country, as some figures which I will now read will demonstrate:

	Republican vote (1896).	Republican vote (1892).	Republican gain.	Per cent of gain.
Kentucky	218,171	135,441	82,730	61
Maryland	136,959	92,736	44,223	47
Missouri	304,940	226,918	78,022	34
North Carolina	155,222	100,342	54,880	54
Tennessee	148,773	100,331	48,442	48
Virginia	135,368	113,262	22,106	19
West Virginia	104,414	80,293	24,121	30
Total	1,203,847	849,323	354,524	*41

* Average, 41 per cent.

Consider these figures, Mr. Speaker. In Kentucky, a gain of over 82,000; in Maryland, a gain of over 44,000; in Missouri, a gain of over 78,000; in North Carolina, a gain of over 54,000; in my own State of Tennessee, a gain of over 48,000; in Virginia, a gain of over 22,000, and in West Virginia, a gain of over 24,000—a total gain in these seven States of 354,000, more than one-third of a million, and all in four years. [Applause.] And in the contest last fall, Mr. Speaker, the Republicans of the South in many places had nothing to sustain them except their devotion to principle. The general tendency in the South was to believe that there was something in the suggestion that we needed more money.

The gospel of free silver was proclaimed on the hilltops and in the valleys, on the right hand and on the left, and many a Republican in the South, thousands and thousands of them, had some indefinite misgiving that there might be something in the gospel of free silver; but they preferred to plant themselves upon the Republican platform and rely upon the Republican party and Republican doctrines, believing the Republican party to be the business man's party and the patriot's party and the only party able to bring prosperity to the people of the United States through legitimate business channels. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] And it took the heroism of a hero; it took the faith of a saint, and it took the nerve of a martyr in many portions of the South to vote the Republican ticket on the 3d day of last November. And after we have fought these battles, after we have incurred these dangers, after we have encountered these obstacles—after all this, to be told upon the floor of the Congress of the United States that we want to be "coddled" like a puling baby in the arms of its nurse! I hurl back that word as an insult to the Republican party of the South [applause], and I am glad to know, Mr. Speaker, that the Republicans of no part of our country, North, East, or West, sympathize with the sneer or the contumely conveyed in that word "coddled."

Mr. Speaker, all that the Republicans of the South want is a fair show. That is all we ask, and when it is once given us, whether as the result of the evolution of right or as the result in part of the action of the Congress of the United States in properly dealing with these contested-election cases, when once we are given a free ballot and a fair count in those States of the South where they are denied, you may rest assured that every State in the South will roll up a Republican majority. [Applause.] For, Mr. Speaker, I say here in my place this day there is not a State south of Mason and Dixon's line that would not to-morrow give a pronounced Republican majority if every male citizen within its borders over 21 years of age were allowed to go freely to the ballot box and deposit his ballot for the choice of his heart and have his ballot counted exactly as it is cast. [Applause.] And yet we are told that the Republicans of the South want to be "coddled!"

After we have made our fight, after we have overcome obstacles which you men of the North and you men of the East and you men of the West know nothing about; obstacles of which the election laws of Virginia as they have been laid before you this day are but a small sample—after we have overcome these obstacles, after we have fought the good fight and kept the faith, when we come here expecting the crown of glory, we are told that all we want is to be "coddled;" and that the time has arrived when the Republicans of the South need to be treated upon "robust principles!" What is meant by "robust principles" I do not know, Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman means to serve notice upon us that in the future whenever a Republican from the South contests a seat on this floor, he is to be kicked out by the Committee on Elections. I suppose that is what is meant by treating us on "robust principles," and I am free to admit that those are very robust principles. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, it was said of Aristides of old, who was banished by the Athenians, not because of any offense of his own, but because people had grown tired of hearing him called "The Just," that as he passed out through the gates of Athens he raised his hands to heaven and prayed to the gods that Greece might never need the help of his strong right arm. So, sir, I pray here to-day that the Republicans of the East, and the Republicans of the North, and the Republicans of the West may never need the help of the Republicans of the South. I hope, gentlemen, you will always be strong enough to maintain a majority in the Congress of the United States, and to keep a man of your choice in the White House at the other end of the Avenue. But as Greece did require the aid of Aristides in the dark days of her national danger, so I say to you men who talk about "coddling" the Republicans of the South, that the day may come when you will turn your hands toward the Republicans of the South and cry, like Cæsar of old, "Save us, or we perish!" [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, was I recognized for the full hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman was recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, all that we Republicans of the South ask is justice. Now I want to give this House a sample of the sort of justice that is accorded us here. Two or three days ago we had before this body two claims. One was called a Cayuse claim, a claim for $350 compensation for the killing of some cattle by our troops in the year 1847, fifty years ago, out in the Indian country. That claim was fifty years old, but it was the claim of an Iowa man and that was enough; it was paid. As soon as the Iowa gentleman had taken his seat, having got his claim allowed, a Kentucky member here, my friend from the Eleventh district of Kentucky, rose and presented a Kentucky claim for two mules that had done service in the Union Army, for these identical mules are shown by the record to have been used in the Union Army during the war for the suppression of the rebellion. The owner claimed compensation for those two mules that the Union troops had taken for their own purposes, had taken to assist them in putting down the rebellion, but he was denied payment, and yet these two mules had helped to save our country. That is a sample of how the Republicans of the South are being "coddled."

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; that is a sample.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir; that is a small sample of it. Again, the Court of Claims has passed upon a hundred and more claims by due process of law, and decided that that number of persons living south of Mason and Dixon's line are each entitled to be paid the amount of his claim, but we have been unable, either during this Congress or during the last Congress, to call up a single one of those claims, much less the whole of them, and have it paid. And yet, Mr. Speaker, on the events which gave rise to those claims was based the salvation of our country, because I say here, and I say it knowingly, that had it not been for the Union men of the South, the rebellion would never have been suppressed. It was their strong arms, their heroism, their faith in their country, their valor on the battlefield, that turned the scales of victory.

The Union armies could never have subsisted in the South in some of the most perilous periods of the war had it not been for the provisions and the forage that the Union people of the South voluntarily poured into the Union camps to support the men and feed the horses and save the army from being forced to retreat to the Ohio River for subsistence and forage. And yet, notwithstanding the sacrifices we have made, notwithstanding the patriotism displayed, notwithstanding the heroism exhibited, we have had pitiful and scant justice on this floor. And when a Republican out of many (for nearly all the men seated at the last session were Populists)—when a Republican comes here asking to be seated, we are told he is to be dealt with "on robust principles," and that the mere asking of the right to a seat is asking to be taken up into the arms of this House and "coddled" like a baby in its swaddling clothes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me allude to the vote in the Yost case. There were 119 Republicans voting to seat Mr. Yost and only 53 Republicans voted against seating him, the balance of the votes against him being Democratic. The Republicans in favor of Mr. Yost were more than 2 to 1. And that very fact—the fact that a large majority of the Republicans of this House were in favor of seating Mr. Yost—satisfies me that the gentleman from Massachusetts, when he spoke of "robust principles" and "coddling," did not represent the Republican majority in this House. I am glad to know it. I will take that fact home with me to my people, and when they ask me what was said about "coddling"—what was said about treating the Republicans of the South on "robust principles"—I shall be able to stand up and say to them: "My friends, that was the utterance of a man who was not backed by the Republican majority in the House of Representatives. He was not sustained. One hundred and nineteen Republicans voted against him and only 53 Republicans voted with him."

In his speech the gentleman referred to the Hall of Ulysses. He says that the slaughter of the Democratic Congressmen at the last session reminded him of the slaughter of the lovers of Penelope. Now, that was a remark not at all complimentary to our Democratic colleagues here because the lovers of Penelope were wrongfully in that house. They had no right to be in that house. They were trespassers there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for five minutes longer.

Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. The lovers of Penelope had no right in the Hall of Ulysses. They were there as interlopers; they were there as trespassers; they were there devouring the substance of the grand old hero then wandering on sea and wandering on land, fighting the stars in their courses, and with the fates arrayed against him. And so, when the gentleman speaks of their slaughter, he speaks of the slaughter of men who were in the wrong. And his simile is not at all complimentary to the Democratic members on this floor. The lovers of Penelope ought to have been slaughtered according to the ethics of those rude times. And so the man that comes here to take a seat to which he is not justly entitled—I care not whether he be Republican or whether he be Democrat—should be denied that seat. But I say this to Republican members here: That whenever a Republican in a Presidential election in any of the Southern States comes within a thousand votes of a majority, it is absolutely certain that if a fair election had been held and a fair count of the result made he would have had a thousand majority. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] There is no question about that.

Mr. MEREDITH. I deny it.

Mr. GIBSON. Of course you deny it. That is part of your platform.

Mr. MEREDITH. The gentleman when he makes that statement knows it is not true.

Mr. GIBSON. I know it is true.

Mr. MEREDITH. I deny it.

Mr. GIBSON. You are paid to deny it. You are sent here for the purpose of denying it.

Mr. MEREDITH. That is absolutely false.

Mr. GIBSON. Your State and every one of these negro States—I would not live in one of them. So far as I am concerned, I want to say here that I represent a white constituency. There are only about 4,300 colored voters in my whole Congressional district. I represent one county that has only seven colored voters born in it. I am proud of the constituency I represent. And I ask nothing for it. We are able to take care of ourselves. I was sent here by a majority of 18,664.

Mr. MEREDITH. God help the majority, then!

Mr. GIBSON. In every section of the South where the whites are in a majority, there the Republicans are in a majority. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is only by the infamous Democratic election laws that the negro vote is turned against the party of their choice. [Applause on the Republican side.] And when ever that negro vote is voted as the Constitution of our country intended it should be, and as Republican liberty requires it to be, then Democratic domination in the South will have come forever to an end. [Applause.] And then we shall no more have men rising on the floor here and saying they deny it. Those men will be left forever in the rear, and so far in the rear that the most improved telescope will be utterly unable to discover their existence politically. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, having been given this opportunity to represent the views and the condition of the Republicans of the South, thanking the House for its courtesy in extending my time, I bring my remarks to an end. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how much time is remaining to me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman has fifty-seven minutes remaining.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I yield twenty minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Elections, reporting the case now pending before the House, it will be my duty in the brief time allotted to me to present simply the facts in the case. I have not time, in the twenty minutes accorded me, to go into any extended or detailed inquiry into the validity of the claims presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] who has just taken his seat, but shall confine myself to the great question as to whether or not the gentleman whose seat is contested on this floor is entitled to retain that seat. That is the question before us. And therefore I shall be compelled to confine myself to the law and evidence in the case that is now pending. Because the House has to consider this matter, it is sitting in a judicial capacity; and it ought to determine this question in a judicial manner. The ordinary questions of politics, the rights and wrongs of the Republicans of the South, or any other people, ought not, it seems to me, to be intruded here, where we are sitting as judges to determine correctly a grave constitutional question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the facts before the committee, we find that the contestee in this case comes to the House with a certificate of election based upon a plurality of 2,333. The gentlemen who make the minority report hunted long and faithfully in order to find some fraud, or other means, by which to oust the contestee from his seat. But after diligent search it was impossible for them to find any element of fraud in connection with the matter, and so they reversed their prior course and reported to the House that the law of the State of Virginia, under which the contestee holds the seat, is unconstitutional, and therefore that there was no election.

Now, I think, sir, that the House should be most thoroughly advised as to its own record on this identical question, because it has established during this Congress, and notably at the last session, a large number of precedents that certainly ought to be considered as the rule of the House in determining another case of the same character.

As far as the facts are concerned immediately connected with the election, it seems that there are 144 election precincts in this Congressional district. In only 12 of these precincts was any testimony taken, and there are only 5 of the precincts referred to in their notice of contest. But we took proof with reference to 7. Now, sir, if we throw out every one of these precincts, conceding that the votes therein cast were fraudulent and ought not to be counted, still the contestee would hold his seat by a plurality of over 1,600 votes; and it seems to me that this is a very important matter, and that the House should thoroughly understand it.

If I understood my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS], he said that there were four cases from Virginia already pending, and all depending on the validity of this law, and he further followed up the statement by another statement, wherein he said that the law of Virginia was unreasonable—he did not say that the law of Virginia was unconstitutional, but that the law was unreasonable—and therefore on account of its unreasonableness it was unconstitutional.

Now, as a lawyer, I can not subscribe to such a doctrine as that, that because the law is unreasonable it is therefore necessarily unconstitutional. It does not follow by any means. If the law is unconstitutional, it is because it violates one provision of the Constitution. In the language of the learned and labored argument read here by the gentleman from Michigan this morning, which is based practically upon his minority report of the case, he nowhere cited a single provision of the Constitution in order that the House might determine judicially whether the law of Virginia is in violation of the Constitution or not.

But, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to the precedents established by this House itself upon this identical question. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the law of Virginia is unconstitutional, there is not a single particle of evidence here, sir, that anyone was deprived of his right by reason of the unconstitutionality of the law, but everybody there seems to be proceeding on the theory that it was a valid law, and that an election was held under it, and everybody there was permitted to participate in that election. I call the attention of the House particularly to the fact that in the resolution offered here there is no evidence that any man was complaining of the unconstitutionality of the law, or that he was denied any right by reason of its unconstitutionality; but, on the contrary, that everyone who was an elector of the State was permitted to exercise his political right. Therefore I say that you will not find in the record appended to the case anything to show that any elector of the State of Virginia was deprived of his legal right by reason of that law. It therefore was a de facto election.

Now our contention is, and was in the committee, as a matter of law——

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Is it not a well-established principle of law that the de facto officer holds his office until the de jure officer shall have been duly appointed and qualified?

Mr. JENKINS. I so understand it; that would be my view of the law.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that in this long, learned, and elaborate report submitted by the minority and in the long speech read here by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] there was no claim made that the contestant in this case has a majority. There is no suggestion that an elector was denied the right to vote or that there was any fraud. No such charge was made, nor is there any claim that for any reason the contestant is entitled to his seat or that, if the law had been constitutional, a different result would have been reached.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the last session of this Congress there were 9 cases decided by this House and at this session 2 cases decided by this House—11 in all—where this constitutional question was raised, and this House subscribed to the doctrine that, even conceding the law to be unconstitutional, yet if an election was held under that law—a de facto election, as I have said—then the contestant was not entitled to his seat by virtue of the unconstitutionality of that law, but that he must go further, and show by competent evidence that in fact enough electors were deprived of their legal rights by virtue of the unconstitutionality of the law to change the result.

Now, those cases arose in three of the States of this Union. There was the case of Thorp vs. McKenney, a case arising under this very same law. There were twenty-two pages of the report in that case, and not a single word was said therein against the law. There was the celebrated case of Yost vs. Tucker, to which reference has been made, in which case there were thirty-eight pages of report; but not a single word was said against this law. Then, again, there was the case of Hoge vs. Otey. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that these gentlemen are very inconsistent in coming before this House to-day and saying that the contestee is not entitled to retain his seat on account of the unconstitutionality of this law, when in three prior cases these same gentlemen have reported in favor of one party or the other holding his seat, and maintaining that that law was valid.

Now, it is begging the question to say that the constitutional question was not raised in those cases. That is a question for this House to determine without any allegation whatever, because, if a gentleman can not retain his seat in this House on the bare fact that he is holding it here under a law that is unconstitutional, then of course that gentleman is not entitled to membership in this House, and it would be the duty of the House on its own motion to exclude him. Therefore, we can not dodge this question by saying that that question was not particularly called to the attention of the House.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does not Judge Bigelow lay down in his work on estoppel the doctrine that where two persons participate in an election, both are estopped from denying the validity of the law under which the election is held?

Mr. JENKINS. If my friend from New Jersey says that that is the rule, I will accept it as correct. I am not familiar with Bigelow on election cases. I would admit it if I knew it to be the fact; but at the same time I call the attention of the House particularly to the report that was made in the Mississippi cases. This same committee had three cases before it from the State of Mississippi, and my learned friend from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] subscribed to the majority report. I want to invite the careful attention of the House to the report that was made in all three of those cases. A part of the report, as I take it from the case of Newman vs. Spencer, reads as follows:

As the committee is of the opinion that a decision that the constitution of the State of Mississippi was invalid would not necessarily deprive the State of representation in Congress, it does not attempt to decide that question, and in the absence of any testimony on behalf of the contestant it recommends the adoption of the following resolutions.

Which resolutions were in favor of the contestee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that doctrine was correctly set forth that in the absence of evidence the fact that the law was unconstitutional would not affect the case.

Those Mississippi cases were followed by four cases from the State of South Carolina. Let me call the attention of the House to the statement that in all four of those cases the committee, as shown by their reports, were unanimous in favor of the unconstitutionality of the law; and yet, upon the recommendation of that committee, three gentlemen were seated under that unconstitutional law. Therefore I say that it is too late for this House at this time to turn down and reverse all of those precedents and to hold that, on account of the unconstitutionality of the law, the contestee is not entitled to his seat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was one thing suggested here this morning by a question asked by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART] which is very important here for our consideration. It is the identical doctrine that was so bitterly opposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS], when he spent so much time in attacking the supreme court of the State of Virginia; that is, the doctrine that we are bound by the decision of the supreme court of Virginia upon the constitutionality of this law. The attention of the House in other cases has been called to authorities sustaining that position. Now, I was a little surprised at the language used and the position taken by my learned colleague on the committee [Mr. THOMAS], because, if I understood him correctly—and I do not desire to misquote him—he terribly misrepresents the supreme court of the State of Virginia, and misrepresents the facts in that case. If I understood him, he said that it was an action for the collection of a debt, and though, in response to a question addressed to him by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], he said that before he got through he would state whether or not the constitutional question was raised by the pleadings, I do not remember that he said anything further on the subject; but I did understand him, as far as his argument went, to say that that action was brought by a person in the State of Virginia for the purpose of collecting a debt, and that it was a collusive action, and that the plaintiff disappeared from the court soon after the bill was taken as confessed in the court below.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that those statements, if I understood them correctly, are not correct. I have that case in my hand, and I have very carefully considered it. I want to say that as far as that case is concerned it was an action brought directly by electors of the State of Virginia for the express purpose of testing the constitutionality of that law, and that was really the only question that was involved in that case. I think that that case was well decided.

Now, it is stated, Mr. Speaker, in the opening of the case, and referred to by the judge who read the opinion, that the case was brought by electors of Virginia for the purpose of preventing the proper officers from doing certain duties in regard to that law. It seems that there were some things done under the law by some of the election officers of the State of Virginia, and that they applied for payment for their services; that orders were drawn and they were going to be delivered, and the case was brought by these electors to prevent the payment of these orders. The supreme court, I think, properly held that they had not proven an equitable action, and their remedy was later on. The constitutionality of the law was directly raised in the case, and that necessarily, for they pleaded specially that the law was unconstitutional; and that they had no right to create any liability under a law which was unconstitutional. The court held that this very law which is attacked by the minority of this committee was unconstitutional; and now I think it is a very unfair thing to come before this House and say that the plaintiff dropped out of the case. He did not drop out of the case until after the supreme court had passed upon it, and it would naturally follow for one to drop out of a case then. But when his case was decided by the court below he took steps to have the case passed upon by the supreme court of the State of Virginia. He could do nothing more. He did all he could to bring it to the attention of the court, and in a very elaborate and learned argument the question of the constitutionality of the law was presented to the court, and, as I said, the court unanimously held that the law was constitutional. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are absolutely bound by that law, and to look also to the decisions of this House, this House having decided in this Congress eleven separate cases, that even admitting that the law is unconstitutional, it does not affect a member's right to a seat.

We are asked now to reverse that action and hold contrary to all these precedents overwhelmingly created in this House, and to say that this gentleman is not entitled to his seat because that law is unconstitutional.

If that is correct, Mr. Speaker, there is not one of the gentlemen sitting upon this floor to-day from the State of Virginia entitled to his seat in this House. If this House can go so far as to exclude the contestee from his seat, it is their plain duty to go further—because we take judicial notice of this case—and exclude the other nine members upon the ground that they have no right to sit here in this House. It seems to me that we would be occupying a very inconsistent position to say that this one gentleman is not entitled to a seat here because the law is unconstitutional, and that the other gentlemen should be entitled to their seats.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to go further and say that I do not believe that there is any lawyer upon this floor who will carefully examine this law who will say for a moment that the law is unconstitutional. It merely provides that in the case of an illiterate voter a constable appointed for the express purpose, and who takes an oath to properly discharge his duties, shall point out to the illiterate voter and mark for him as asked the names on his ticket. But that does not disclose for whom he wants to vote. Now, it seems to me it is not sufficient to say that it is unconstitutional. As a lawyer, after careful examination, I agree with the chairman of this committee that this provision of the law of the State of Virginia is not unconstitutional, but it is constitutional, Mr. Speaker, and we are backed up in that opinion by the decision of the supreme court of the State of Virginia, the only proper tribunal to pass upon that question.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am informed by a creditable gentleman who has examined the law of the State of Michigan that they have a law somewhat similar there. I am told by this same gentleman that the law of the State of Michigan does not provide that the election officers shall be divided between the two political parties, or appointed from the two political parties, but that the law is silent in reference to that, leaving it, as under the law of Virginia, for them to select them from any one party that they see fit; but there is still further in that law a provision that the illiterate must call upon two gentlemen of opposite politics——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILNES. I would like to say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat that the law of Michigan does provide for a nonpartisan board.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the case before the House, the Committee on Elections is unanimous in reporting that there are but 12 precincts attacked by the contestant, and that, eliminating those 12 districts from the election returns entirely, the contestee is still elected by something like 1,500 majority. That being so, it removes the question of fact from the consideration of the House, and the only question left to be determined is, Shall the sitting member be continued in his seat or shall he be ousted? As I understand from the discussion, the only way to oust the sitting member would be to hold that the election laws of the State of Virginia are unconstitutional.

Now, sir, I do not intend to go into the question of the constitutionality of the election laws of the State of Virginia, nor to discuss the pending case at length one way or the other, but rather to speak of election laws in a general way and for a few moments only. Within the last eight years the election laws in all or nearly all the States have been modified and changed in the name of "reform," and the Australian ballot system is the one that has been most generally adopted by the Northern, the Western, and the Eastern States. Those States have adopted the Australian ballot law almost in its purity, while the Southern States, under guise of adopting the Australian ballot law, have given us a system of election law that is for the most part a corruption of the Australian system. They have twisted and modified that system until now it is with difficulty that a man who is not educated can vote at all in the South. I have arisen on this occasion merely to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a tabulated statement of the election laws of the several States of the Union, tabulated only a few days ago by an ex-member of this body, Hon. John C. Houk, of Tennessee. This statement gives the election laws of every State in the Union, and shows that they are all framed more or less after the Australian ballot system. The Virginia law which applies in the pending case is given here among the others, and I now ask consent to print this tabulated statement in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I thank the House. I believe members will find this statement a treasury of information clearly and intelligently arranged and correct in the main. I will not detain the House longer, but will yield the remainder of my time back to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS].

The statement presented by Mr. McCALL of Tennessee is as follows:

EXPLANATION.

The foregoing table has been carefully compiled, mainly from pamphlets containing the election laws furnished by the respective secretaries of state.

Every State in the Union, except Rhode Island, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, has published its election laws in special form. On some few points the general statutes or codes of States have been consulted, and questions have been propounded to and answered by secretaries of state through the mail.

While it is not insisted that the tabulation is perfect, it is claimed to be substantially correct, so far as it goes, most of it having been verified with special care.

The tabulation has been arranged by grand divisions, so as to more readily show, as far as they may be indicated by the table, the development of the election laws in each general section of the country.

The election laws of each State have, with just or unjust intention, been materially amended, almost without exception, since 1888, the year what is known as the "Australian law" began to gain permanent foothold in this country. Michigan led the way in the direction of the Australian system in the United States.

The table shows about 585 points in relation to the election laws of the various States, or about 13 points for each State.

1. In the column headed "Prepayment of poll tax" is indicated what States require prepayment before a voter can vote.

2. In the column headed "Registration" the word "general" means that registration prevails throughout the State, while the word "limited" means that registration is confined to certain counties or cities.

3. In the column headed "Official ballot," the word "general" means that the ballot is printed by the State or county, throughout the State, while the word "limited" means that the State or county prints the ballot only in certain counties.

4. In the column headed "Party column or group," the word "column" means that the ballot contains a column for each party, in which only the names of the candidates of a certain party are printed. The words "group for electors" mean that only the electors are arranged by party groups, while all other candidates for all other positions are arranged, irrespective of party, under the name of the office.

5. In the column headed "Politics opposite candidate," it is shown whether the politics of each candidate is printed opposite his name on the ballot.

6. In the column headed "Party emblem" is indicated whether the law authorizes or permits one column or ballot to be distinguished from another by a party device or emblem.

7. In the column marked "One mark for straight ticket" is indicated whether the voter can vote for each candidate for each office on a certain party ticket by making a single mark at the head of his party column or elsewhere on the ballot.

8. In the column headed "Vote by scratch or X" is indicated whether the voter votes by scratching out the name of the candidate he desires not to vote for, or whether he votes by marking an X opposite the name of each man he votes for.

9. In the column headed "Mark each name voted" is indicated whether the voter shall mark each name voted for (or scratch each name not voted for)—the word "optional," wherever it appears in that column, meaning that the voter can either mark each name or vote for all candidates of a given party by a single mark (X).

10. In the column headed "Poll-tax receipt or registration certificate presented" is indicated whether the voter shall present either or both at the polls before voting. In the same column the words "proves payment taxes" mean that the voter must furnish the judges with satisfactory evidence that he has paid his taxes.

11. In the column headed "Instructions or sample ballot" is indicated whether official printed instructions are furnished before or during the balloting, or whether the law authorizes or permits the posting or distribution among the electors of a sample ballot before or during the voting. In the same column the words "official ballot given out" mean that the State or county distributes official ballots among the voters before the election.

12. In the column headed "Voter assisted" is indicated under what circumstances the voter can receive assistance in voting, and what States in effect have an educational qualification.

13. In the column headed "Primary laws" the word "yes" means that the State has laws regulating primary elections and conventions, at least to the extent of prescribing penalties for committing fraud in the same, etc., while the word "limited" means that the State only goes so far as to prescribe the manner of certifying to the officials printing the ballots the names of the nominees, etc., as in Tennessee.

MISCELLANEOUS.

(a) In the "Registration" column the words "general, but voidable" mean that registration is required throughout the State, but that no elector can be deprived of his vote by reason of not being registered if he presents himself at the polls and proves that he is otherwise qualified, etc.

(b) In the "Official ballot" column the words "Unofficial ballot for each party" mean that each party prints its own ballots throughout the State, limited by the law in certain cases only as to size and color, etc., as in Tennessee, with respect to the "uniform" ballot.

(c) In the column headed "Party column or group" the words "Official ballot for each party" mean that the State either prints a separate ballot marked on the back "Official ballot" for each party, or furnishes blank ballots stamped on the back "Official ballot" to the committees or candidates of each party, by them to be completed by printing the names of the candidates of their party on the face of the official blanks.

(d) In the column "Vote by scratch or X" the words opposite Louisiana, "Obliteration by stamp," mean that an elector votes by obliterating with a rubber stamp a circular white spot in the black square put to the right of the name of each candidate. The name of a candidate preceding a white spot that is not marked or blotted out is not voted for. In the same column, where the word "Stamp" appears in parenthesis, the authorities of the State or county furnish a stamp and ink pad, which the voter must use in marking his ballot.

(e) Wherever the word "unnecessary" occurs in the table, its use can be accounted for by the fact that the ballot is unofficial and is furnished by the respective party committees.

(f) In Connecticut and New Jersey only, the elector votes by placing his ballot in an envelope. This was once done in Massachusetts.

(g) Of the New England States, Massachusetts has a constitutional provision that the voter shall read and write before he can vote, unless he was a voter prior to 1857, and Connecticut by her constitution requires that an elector shall read.

(h) Of the Southern States, South Carolina's constitution requires that the voter shall be able to read or construe the constitution in 1898, and the constitution of Mississippi has the same provision, which is now in effect.

(i) The constitution of Ohio prohibits the requirement to prepay a poll tax.

(j) The constitution of Arkansas prohibits registration.

(k) In South Dakota registration is optional with the counties, but none of the counties have adopted it.

(l) In Oregon registration was declared unconstitutional ten years ago.

(m) In South Carolina the voter has to either pay "all" polls due or all taxes on $300 or more of property before he can vote.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to consume his time now?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the discussion of this question should have departed from the facts presented to the House in the record. I think it is necessary, if we desire to do justice in these cases, that we should decide each one absolutely upon its own merits. If we decide each time as best we may upon the record which is presented, even then we shall sometimes go wrong; but if we decide upon general principles or upon our ideas of what should be done for the party here or there, we shall rarely go right.

I do not care to follow the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] in the course of his remarks, but I will say that I do not propose to let his noisy intrusion into this debate put me in a false position. I said nothing in the speech to which he alluded which can fairly bear the construction which he puts upon it, although I entered upon that portion of my argument as my time was expiring and could only express myself very imperfectly. I think that the time has come for us to cease to divide the people of the North, or of the South, or of any part of this country into sheep and goats. I think that where you divide men into large masses upon whatever issue, whether it relates to the tariff, or to the free coinage of silver, or to the single gold standard, those masses of people will average about equally in honesty. Certainly neither will have a monopoly of that article. We have been decorating the Southern Democrats with every vice that deforms human nature, and we have at the same time been unjust to the Southern Republican, have almost deified him and put him in a place where no mortal should stand. I believe that, take the Southern Democrats and Southern Republicans as a whole, they are not either greatly worse or greatly better than each other. I simply ask for the Southern Republicans that they shall have the same treatment as people in other parts of the country, and that we shall no longer make them the inmates of a hothouse and subject them to the application of special theories and special principles which we apply to nobody else.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in his speech on the Yost-Tucker case, used this language:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we ought at this late day to do justice by the people of Virginia. We have for years here attempted to build up the Republican party in the South by seating this man and that man and by patronage; and the result is that they display their chief vitality and strength in our national Republican conventions, where they generally appear with as many different delegations as there are candidates for the Presidency.

I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he intended, by that language, to embrace the Republicans of the State of Kentucky?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend that language to apply to the Republicans of Kentucky, as it has been quoted and misapplied to the people of the whole South. For that matter, I had no thought of Kentucky.

Mr. LEWIS. I simply desire to say, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that I know of no contest by Kentucky Republicans in any Republican national convention except in one district in 1880. I am the only Republican who ever represented the district I have now the honor to represent on this floor, and I want to state that this is the only office I ever held, and I state further that I was not assisted to that office by any patronage or by any "coddling" whatever. I was sent here by the people of that district, and I tried to do my duty as their Representative.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen a disposition upon this floor to assume that Southern Republicans are inferior in respectability or in social standing to Democrats. My ancestors before me, sir, were Virginians, but they have always been loyal. [Applause.] And if the men in Kentucky who fought the battles of the country when the country needed their support, if the men in Kentucky who in 1861 decided that Kentucky should stay in the Union and not go out of it—and my people were among them—if those men are not as good and as respectable and as honorable and as much entitled to consideration by the nation as any other people in Kentucky, or elsewhere, I have never been conscious of it and never will be. [Applause.] And I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, further, that they are men who never have been "coddled" by the people of Massachusetts, or by any other people. They have never asked to be coddled, and they can take care of themselves without coddling. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not dispute a single word that the gentleman from Kentucky has said here, although I did not yield for a speech, but what I said will apply exactly to this case. I believe that if you will trust the Republicans of the South to act as a party and to act from the strength of the innate principles of the party, instead of taking them under a guardianship which is insulting to them, they will grow stronger and achieve a better standing before the country than they have had heretofore. What the Republicans of certain portions, at least, of the South need is justice. And I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, that during the last half dozen years when they have been little embarrassed by the treatment to which I have referred, when they have breathed the free and fostering air of our institutions, they have grown greatly in strength, as the statistics of the gentleman from Tennessee so amply show.

I do not know as the word coddling has an adjudicated meaning, but I say this particular case will illustrate what I meant by "coddling" the Republicans of the South. Examine the proposition made here by the gentleman from Michigan. Here is a district of 160,000 people, casting about 22,000 votes for Representatives in Congress at an election when no other officer was to be chosen, when that office alone was to be filled. I say that vote for that population at an election for a single office is as great as we would have in a district in Massachusetts with an equal population.

Now, the contestant has appeared here and has alleged certain things against that election. We examine the record. We find that in only 12 precincts in the 144 precincts of that district has he introduced a particle of evidence.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have yielded for one speech already——

Mr. THOMAS. I wish only to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I stated very explicitly that this evidence was taken in five out of the seven counties of the district; that the evidence was taken for the purpose of showing the inherently wrong quality of the law itself, and not for the purpose of impeaching the returns by showing fraud. I desire to have the House understand that explicitly. And it is begging the question to say that only 12 out of the 144 precincts were investigated. The remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] admitted fraud in every one of them. The statement I have made has not been controverted. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] conceded the same thing.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I can not yield further. The gentleman has already occupied an hour and a half of the time of the House. But I say the contestant who assailed this election has produced evidence as to only twelve precincts; and I do not believe that the evidence would justify the rejection of two of those precincts. I do not believe that either the gentleman from Virginia or the gentleman from Wisconsin has admitted fraud.

The gentleman from Michigan now says that those precincts were taken as samples. I never before knew that theory to be applied to the decision of a contested-election case—that when the contestant fails in making out his case, he may take two or three precincts of the district and say that they are to be accepted as samples of the whole district. It seems to me that is a novel method of procedure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to return to my proposition. There were only twelve precincts here that were assailed. I do not believe the evidence would justify the exclusion of two of them. But you may reject the whole twelve; and the contestee still stands here elected by 1,539 majority.

At this point the gentleman from Michigan proposes to do what I call "coddling." He proposes to apply to the Republicans of the South a principle that he would never apply in the Northern States. He says that this election law, solemnly adopted by the legislature of Virginia, is unconstitutional; that, the law being unconstitutional, there can be no valid election held under it, and therefore upon that ground alone (for the whole argument of the gentleman is based upon it) the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] must be taken from his seat. Now, let us look at the argument. In the first place, if that law was unconstitutional as to the contestee, it was unconstitutional as to the other three parties in contested-election cases which this House by vote has already seated. It is unconstitutional as to the six members from that State who are here without any contest. And it is an extraordinary proposition at this day—thirty days before the close of the session—that we shall throw this gentleman out upon an argument or assumption which would turn out the whole Virginia delegation.

Furthermore, this law has been passed upon by the highest judicial tribunal in the State of Virginia. That tribunal has unanimously held that the law is constitutional. The gentleman from Michigan proposes, in violation of all the precedents, to have this House sit here as a supreme court of appeals, overrule the court of appeals of Virginia, and declare that the law is unconstitutional.

Now, the cases are very clear upon this point. I will read first from McCrary on Elections a statement of the law which every lawyer will recognize as elementary. He says:

The House of Representatives of the United States in construing a State law will follow the construction given it by the authorities of the State whose duty it is to construe and execute it. When a given construction has been adopted and acted upon by the State authorities, the Federal Government should abide by and follow it.

And the same doctrine is laid down in many cases. I do not believe that any authority to the contrary can be found anywhere.

The American and English Encyclopedia of Law, quoting a recent case, says:

The House when adjudicating upon any matter affecting the seats of its members must be governed by the laws of the State in which the election was held upon questions of the qualifications of the voters; and where there is no act of Congress providing for the method of conducting the election the House is compelled to follow the State law upon that subject. It follows as a necessary conclusion, as the courts of a State are the proper tribunals to construe its statutes, that when the highest court of a State has given a construction to a provision of the State constitution or statute, such construction should be followed by any other tribunal called upon to pass upon the same question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. With pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the unconstitutionality of the election laws of Virginia necessarily to be held as established in order to seat the contestant?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Why, it is admitted that the contestant has no case. It is not claimed that he has any case in the report of the minority, and they only allege the unconstitutionality of the law——

Mr. HENDERSON. You mean that no claim is set up by those representing him?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. No claim is set up by those representing him that he has a right to a seat here, and no resolution is reported to seat him.

Mr. HENDERSON. Unless the election laws are held to be unconstitutional, then the sitting member is entitled to the seat, as I understand the gentleman?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. There is no question of that. But there is no report which provides that the contestant was elected. The antagonistic proposition is that the election laws of Virginia are unconstitutional, and therefore that no valid election was held, and that being the allegation, the minority provide in their resolution that the sitting member shall be unseated. That is the proposition advocated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. HENDERSON. And, as I understand the gentleman, it is admitted that the constitutionality of the election law of the State of Virginia has been settled by the decision of the supreme court of the State?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That question is in dispute as to whether it was or not.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I hear it suggested, Mr. Speaker, that, as a matter of fact, there is a dispute on the question as to whether the supreme court of the State of Virginia held the law to be constitutional. I will suggest to the gentleman and to the members of the House the nature of the dispute, in order that they may determine this question for themselves. It seems to me that it is even more ridiculous than the contention that the House ought to find that the laws are unconstitutional if the supreme court of the State held them to be constitutional.

Here is the entire decision: The case came before the supreme court of Virginia on an appeal, and the court took jurisdiction of the case and pronounced an opinion upon it, though the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] declares that the supreme court did not have jurisdiction, and therefore that the decision has no binding weight, force, or effect.

Mr. HENDERSON. Was the question fully in issue with reference to the jurisdictional point?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I will read just what the record discloses on that point, and the gentleman can determine for himself. I read from the decision:

The plaintiff further alleges that the act under which these expenses were incurred—

That is, with reference to certain expenses incurred in the operation of the election law of the State—is unconstitutional and void, and that they can not therefore be paid under the general county levy.

The bill states many particulars in which it is supposed that the act is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and to that of the State of Virginia.

The decision then goes on to cite eleven grounds of unconstitutionality.

It then proceeds:

The petition alleges "that the said act is unconstitutional and void; that the costs of conducting the said election, incurred by putting in operation the provisions of the said act, are illegal charges upon the county levy, and the payment thereof should be enjoined; and that the said decree of the circuit court is erroneous for the following reasons, which reasons are assigned as errors in the said decree"—

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is the gentleman reading from the syllabus of the decision?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I am reading from the decision itself of the court. The court further said:

Accompanying the petition is a brief filed by counsel for petitioners, in which the many interesting questions of law arising upon the record are thoroughly discussed. We feel, therefore, that upon the part of the petitioners at least we are in possession of all the means of information which would be accessible to us were the appeal allowed and the case set down for argument. We feel, too, that the questions presented are of the utmost interest to every citizen of the State. We are upon the eve of an election in which many important offices are to be filled, and it is much to be desired that all uncertainty as to the law under which these elections are to be conducted should be removed, and it is therefore a matter of congratulation that the plaintiffs have, in presenting their case to us, thrown sufficient light upon it to enable us to dispose of it without delay and with entire confidence.

And the court goes on and expressly considers the question of constitutionality.

Further on it says:

The vote by ballot ex vi termini implies a secret ballot. The secrecy of the ballot is a right which inheres in the voter and of which he can not, against his will, be lawfully deprived. It must be, however, in some degree subordinate to the right to vote by ballot, of which it is but a part; and the main object, which is the right to vote, must not be defeated by a too rigid observance of the incidental right, which is that of secrecy. A blind man, or a man unable to read, must, in the nature of things, so far compromise the secrecy of his ballot as to invoke and obtain the aid of others in the preparation of his ballot; but as it would be a violation of confidence, were he to seek of a friend assistance on such an occasion, for that friend to betray the secret and disclose the vote, so it is a violation not only of confidence but of official duty for the constable to lift the veil of secrecy, which should be impenetrable, and violate the confidence which the law requires the voter to repose in him. The oath of office of the constable binds him to the performance of the duties imposed upon him not only by statute but by the constitution.

I trust that gentlemen who listened to the argument of the gentleman from Michigan will apply the reasoning of the court to that argument. The court then proceeds to hold, as plainly and as unequivocally as any court in the world has ever held anything, that the so-called Walton election law was constitutional. But the gentleman says they might have dismissed the case on another ground, and that the court says they might. That is true. The court says that it might have dismissed it on another ground. But it considered it on this point, and gave a direct opinion with reference to it. I will read the clause, in order to put the whole question before the House to which the gentleman alludes:

If, however, we had come to a different conclusion as to the constitutional questions involved in the record which accompanies the petition in the case, we should still be obliged to refuse the bill asked for, as the plaintiffs have an adequate and complete remedy at law.

But the court clearly took jurisdiction. It clearly passed on the validity of the laws, and it distinctly held that those laws were valid; and I would say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that one of the most famous judicial decisions ever rendered in this country, the so-called Dred Scott decision, was rendered in a case in which the court held that the court below had absolutely no jurisdiction and to which it could not have remanded that case for a further trial.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thought the days of Dred Scott decisions had gone by.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Yes; but no one questions that the decision was rendered.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. In the face of that decision of the supreme court of Virginia, if this House should decide otherwise, would it not be in effect to deny to that State a republican form of government?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. If this House should decide that those laws were unconstitutional, it would directly overrule the laws that were held by the highest judicial tribunal in Virginia to be constitutional.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. And would deny to that State a republican form of government.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I think so, and I think it would be revolutionary. I want to say further that I think it would hold unconstitutional the laws of a majority of the States in this Union.

If I remember correctly, the constitution of Michigan provides for an election by ballot, and on the reasoning of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS], ex vi termini, the word "ballot" means a secret ballot; and if there is any provision in that law which requires that any voter should disclose to anyone the name of the person for whom he desires to vote, then the law of Michigan is contrary to the constitution of Michigan, as much as the law of Virginia is contrary to the constitution of Virginia. Illiterate voters, men who are mentally or physically blind and unable to prepare their ballots, under the Michigan law have to be assisted by sworn officers of the law. I think you will find this provision in the constitutions of many States, that there shall be an election by ballot, and under every Australian system which we have in this country, so far as I am aware, there is a provision for some public officer aiding a man who can not see, who is physically or educationally unable to cast his vote.

Mr. JONES. If my friend will allow me, I will say that I hold in my hand the election law of the State of Michigan, and it provides that an illiterate voter or a blind voter who can not prepare his ballot shall disclose his wish to an inspector who is appointed for that purpose by the board. He does it in the presence of a challenger, but he must disclose it to this inspector and have it prepared by him.

Mr. MILNES. He does it in the presence of two challengers, one from his own party.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. He may have two, if he wants.

Mr. MILNES. He must have two.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. If my friend will not consume my time, I will say that precisely the same principle is involved, no matter if another challenger is present. The man is compelled to disclose the name of the person or persons for whom he desires to vote to a sworn officer of the law, and that infringes on the secrecy of the ballot; and if the reasoning of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] is correct with regard to this case, then the election law of his own State is absolutely unconstitutional. So I say the gentleman proposes a course for Virginia which he would apply to no Northern State. The word "coddling," which so disturbs the sensibilities of gentlemen, is a feeble term. It is a rank outrage, and you never can establish a party upon such injustice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have presented this case as clearly as I can to the House. If we are to respect this law, there is absolutely no doubt that the contestee was elected by at least 1,500 majority. The only way in which you can disturb him in his seat is to overrule the solemn adjudication of the highest court in Virginia, and hold that that law is unconstitutional, and thereby adopt a principle which would make unconstitutional the election laws of many other States in this country.

This is the last case coming from this committee, I am glad to say——

Mr. GROSVENOR. So am I.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. These are not agreeable cases. I should be very glad to decide, with my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], uniformly in favor of Republicans; but I would say that if the gentleman desires to get somebody who is going to violate the law, and to seat men here who were not elected, then he will have to get some one else than myself to do it. We have, as he has said, had fifteen cases before us, and it is said we have only decided in favor of three Republicans.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Two.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, then, two, if you will have it so. I do not care how bad the record is made out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It could not be much worse.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. But in one of those cases the vote of one side was in round numbers 40,000, and on the other side it was only a few hundred. In at least three others there was no evidence taken. In some cases the pleadings were not even complete. And I venture to say that any lawyer, carefully looking at those records, would not find that there were more than four, or at the most five, cases that were fairly contestable, in which Republicans were interested, and out of those five three Democrats have been unseated. The total record of this House is twelve Democrats unseated, which is a record difficult to parallel.

Mr. HARDY. May I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I ask the gentleman as a lawyer if he maintains that the State of Virginia or any State of this Union has the right to enact election laws relating to the election of members of Congress, and, under a construction of those election laws by the supreme courts of those States as to the constitutionality of those laws, can in any manner impair or abrogate the right of this House under the Constitution to judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. In the absence of a Federal statute, of course Virginia must enact election laws. The question here is whether this particular law is unconstitutional. I believe that the House will say that it is constitutional as a matter of its own construction, and I believe further in this general principle of law, that when a State supreme court has passed upon the validity of a State statute, this House will ordinarily follow its construction.

Mr. Speaker, I do not question the power of this House to decide differently, although I question its right; we have the absolute power, the same as the Supreme Court of the United States has the absolute power to decide any question that comes before it wrongly and in violation of law. We have the giant's strength, but I say we should not use it as a giant does.

Mr. HARDY. But will the gentleman permit me to add: Is it not a fact that there being a great many contested-election cases filed, and about one-third of this House being Democrats, the Speaker, in his wisdom, thought it necessary to have three Election Committees; therefore he appointed one for the benefit of the Democrats, and named the gentleman from Massachusetts very appropriately as the chairman of that committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that question deserves any attention. The gentleman is evidently in a judicial frame of mind and will doubtless vote upon this question in that way. [Laughter.] I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That neither Claude A. Swanson nor George W. Cornett was elected a member of the House of Representatives from the Fifth Congressional district of Virginia for the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, and that neither of them is entitled to the seat.

Mr. THOMAS. On that I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the ayes are 21, the noes 127—not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

The question was then taken on the substitute; and it was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Cornett was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth district of Virginia.

Resolved, That Claude A. Swanson was duly elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth district of Virginia, and is entitled to his seat.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That it shall be in order to offer and consider as an amendment to the bill (H. R. 10167) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes, the following:

"That the act approved February 13, 1895, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

"And all proceedings pending shall be vacated, and no judgment heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid."

Which amendment shall be subject to amendment under the rules of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this rule has relation to a matter which came up in discussion last night on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. The Committee on Rules have heard patiently considerable discussion this morning on the subject, and felt it to be their duty to bring in a rule making the proposed amendment in order—that is to say, that the House may take it up and discuss it, and determine whether they want to adopt the amendment. It is not to be understood by reason of our bringing in this rule and permitting the amendment to be in order that it is any indication from the Committee on Rules as to what the final action of the House may be. Of course, we do not attempt to trench upon the prerogatives of the body of which we are individual members; but we have heard enough to satisfy us that it was our duty to bring it before this House, so that it may be considered as an amendment to the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia. You will observe, also, that the rule provides that if this amendment is offered to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, it will still be subject to amendment under the rules of the House, so that the House can then deal with it as they think proper, voting for it, or voting it down, as suggested by my friend from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY]. With this explanation, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McRAE. Before the gentleman takes his seat, will he tell us what it is that he wants to repeal? He tells us the effect of the rule, but in this part of the Hall we have not understood what the law is that he wants to repeal.

Mr. HENDERSON. The resolution can be reported again in the gentleman's time, if he desires. I do not want it reported again in my time, as it has been read once.

Mr. McRAE. I have no time.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the House shall understand what they are called upon to do in this matter. I undertake to say that by the report just presented it is proposed that the House shall reverse itself and change a rule which has been in vogue not only in this Congress, but through all the different Congresses as far as my memory goes back, and for how many years more I do not know. There is a rule of the House, well defined and well established, which prohibits upon an appropriation bill any amendment making new legislation. In the discussion yesterday on the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia an amendment was offered proposing to repeal a law which was passed by the Fifty-third Congress. That amendment was held to be out of order, and this new rule is brought in for the purpose of carrying out the ideas of some gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations in respect to the repeal of that law.

Now, sir, the rule just brought in by the gentleman from Iowa not only changes a rule which has been in existence and operation here for years and years, it not only calls upon this House to reverse itself in that respect, but it does it for the simple purpose of repealing a law which some gentlemen at least think was a just and proper law, which should have been passed as it was passed by the Fifty-third Congress. Certain gentlemen here have seen fit to take into their own hands the keeping of the conscience of this House, and they propose to run this rule through in order to secure in this summary way the repeal of a law which these gentlemen who constitute themselves the guardians of this Government think ought to be repealed.

Now, let us see exactly where we stand and what we are doing. In the discussion which took place yesterday gentlemen were pleased to say that the act to which I have referred, and which was passed by the Fifty-third Congress, was not proper, and ought not to have been passed; that the bill which was passed on that occasion was not a bill that had been approved or authorized by the District Commissioners. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia do not make the laws of this country. The lawmaking power is the Senate and House of Representatives, the Congress of the United States, and the act complained of, which passed in the Fifty-third Congress, was the act of the lawmaking power of this country.

As to the question whether it was a proper law or not, I will say to my friends who are insisting upon this rule that there is before the Committee on the District of Columbia a resolution in relation to this very subject, which will be passed upon by that committee to-morrow morning. When it was suggested that that resolution should be passed upon to-day I myself, for the purpose of getting such information about this matter as could be had, asked that there might be a hearing on the subject before the committee to-morrow morning, so that gentlemen interested in it might have an opportunity to come before the committee and explain it. I had supposed that that would satisfy the Committee on Rules; that when they were informed that the Committee on the District of Columbia, which properly has jurisdiction over matters of this kind, had before it a resolution looking to the repeal of this law, and when they learned that it was determined by the Committee on the District of Columbia that the question should be passed upon to-morrow and reported for action by the House on the next District day—I had supposed, I say, that when they had that information the Committee on Rules would have been satisfied, and I think they ought to have been satisfied, and ought to have waited to see what would be done by the District Committee, having jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the repeal of any law in this hurried way, by a special rule which may be brought in at any moment to permit the tacking on to an appropriation bill of a repeal of any act upon the statute book. I undertake to say, sir, that if it has ever been done before it has been seldom. The principle of it is vicious. This proposition ought to be considered by the proper committee having jurisdiction of the matter, and I repeat, for the information of the House, that the committee having jurisdiction over the subject, the District Committee, has now before it a resolution in relation to the repeal of this law, which resolution the committee will act upon to-morrow.

Mr. Speaker, a good deal was said on yesterday to prejudice the minds of members of this House in order that they might be the more easily dragooned into the repeal of an act which stands upon our statute books. It was stated that the amount involved would be perhaps a million or over a million dollars. I understand, sir, that some of the objections which were made by gentlemen on yesterday to that law are not correct, and I understand, furthermore, that a statement will be made before the Committee on the District of Columbia to-morrow which will justify the passage of that law by the Fifty-third Congress and will show that gentlemen are incorrect in their statements here and have been misinformed as to the facts. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I do ask that the House proceed in this matter in an orderly and legitimate way. The subject being before the proper committee now, should be considered and reported upon by that committee before gentlemen seek to run through this repeal under a special rule which reverses the order of business in this House and the precedents of this House for many sessions of Congress.

I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, when this proposition was offered as an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, I did not think it ought to be adopted. It was an effort to repeal by an amendment on a general appropriation bill an act passed in the Fifty-third Congress. I was not familiar then, and I am not now familiar, with the merits of that act, passed by the Fifty-third Congress, but I did not believe that the rules of this House ought to be violated by an effort to put a repealing act upon a general appropriation bill by way of amendment. For that reason I thought yesterday that the rules ought to be observed and the point of order sustained, and it was sustained. In the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses the so-called obnoxious measure could have been repealed on the appropriation bill, as its repeal would reduce expenditures, etc. But under the rules of this Congress such amendment is not in order.

Now, the Committee on Rules propose to change the rules of the House so that it shall be in order to move the repeal of that general law on a general appropriation bill. That is the object of the present resolution. Mr. Speaker, I yesterday made the statement that no effort had been made, so far as I knew, to have the appropriate committee (that is, the Committee on the District of Columbia) consider the repealing resolution or measure. I stated the truth. I did not know at that time that any bill had been introduced or was pending before that committee contemplating the repeal of the obnoxious measure, so called, passed in the Fifty-third Congress. I was mistaken, however, when I created the impression, if I did create it, that such a measure had not been introduced. As a matter of fact, last summer or last spring such a bill was introduced, and it has been pending for some time before the District Committee—how long I can not now undertake to state. But the main statement which I made is true—that neither the District Commissioners nor the assessor of the District, nor any other person speaking for the District government, has sought to have the attention of the District Committee called to this repealing measure.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me—and I say this in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who, I think, would say it if he were here, because he told me this morning that he would—that it is not treating the District Committee fairly to come in here now and oust them of the jurisdiction to consider further this measure which they are considering, and which, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, they have had a special call to consider, notice having been given to the District Commissioners, the parties in interest, the gentlemen representing these claims, and other persons, to appear before the committee to-morrow morning for a full hearing. It seems to me it is treating that committee rather cavalierly—it is treating them with more or less disrespect—to oust them of jurisdiction of a matter which under the rules belongs exclusively to that committee. If the House sees fit to do it, all right.

I have not had time to examine the merits of the proposition, and I do not say I favor payment of the claims referred to. The bill which was passed in the Fifty-third Congress was in charge of a Representative from Alabama, Judge Cobb, a careful legislator.

Now, gentlemen come here and undertake to override the rules of the House, which do not permit this repealing matter to be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. They undertake to provide by a special rule that it shall be in order to make this repeal on an appropriation bill. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that they ought to have waited at least until the District Committee had declined or refused in some way to bring about the relief which these gentlemen so earnestly seek. It may be right to grant the relief, but I think it ought to come in the regular way. We ought to have given the District Committee—which has jurisdiction of this measure, which has entered upon its consideration, and has given notice of a hearing to-morrow morning—an opportunity to complete its hearing and report all the facts to this House.

I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that in a few moments after this resolution is agreed to (if it should be adopted) the House will go i to Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; will take up this general appropriation bill; immediately the gentleman from Missouri or some other gentleman will propose this amendment, and we shall be called upon to vote upon it without the information that this House is entitled to have in considering a measure of this importance. It occurs to me that the orderly way to transact this business would be to let the District Committee report upon it; and I say without hesitation I do believe that if these claims are unjust and ought not to be paid the District Committee to-morrow morning will agree upon such a report and submit all the information to the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] yield for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. My time has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

Mr. DOCKERY. And let there be two minutes extension on the other side.

Mr. HENDERSON. Whatever additional time may be given to that side, I shall ask be given also to this.

Mr. STEELE. I think the rules provide enough time. I object.

Mr. MEREDITH. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] has eight minutes left.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let me state the situation in which the House finds itself. Under the old rule of the House—section 3 of Rule XXI—it would have been in order on an appropriation bill to offer an amendment reducing the expenditures of the Government or cutting down appropriations. That clause of the rule has been left out of the present code of rules.

Now, it turns out that two years ago there was passed, upon the statement that the probable obligations to be incurred by the Government thereunder would be about $75,000, a bill under which there have been banked up before the Court of Claims claims to the amount of $1,400,000. Those claims arose in this way: Under the régime existing here from 1870 to 1874, known as the Shepherd régime, the old board of public works undertook to go beyond the contracts of the parties and to give larger amounts for excavating and improving the streets of this city than the written contracts called for. The bill I have just mentioned provided that parties who had been contracted with at rates beyond the contracts which they had originally entered into might go before the Court of Claims and establish their claims. As I have stated, the amount which those claims would probably reach was placed at $75,000. It turns out that the claims amount to over $1,000,000. How much of this would be allowed by the court we can not know now.

Now, the only question involved here—and one upon which the Committee on Rules is unanimous—was, Shall the House of Representatives have an opportunity, by means of an amendment to be proposed to the District appropriation bill, to consider whether it will go on with the payment of these claims or whether it will say that the action taken in the Fifty-third Congress on this subject was injudicious? I will not go into a discussion of the merits of these claims at present. Whatever my individual notions may be upon it I will reserve. Let the House determine that question for itself. But the question now presented involves the freedom of the House to act. Will you give to the House jurisdiction? Will you let the House have an opportunity to repeal this law if, in the opinion of the majority, it ought to be repealed? In this resolution we fix no limitation upon debate; we fix no time for a vote. We propose no hampering rules under which this question is to be considered. But we say, let the House have an opportunity to consider an amendment on this subject which, under the old rules of the House, it could have considered. This and nothing more. If the House concludes to consider an amendment providing for a repeal or change of the law named, that proposition will be subject to amendment, and the entire subject can be treated.

I might state that I think it was always wise to allow amendments on appropriation bills which authorized reductions of expenditures or retrenchment of the amounts carried by the bill. This rule simply applies that principle to this District bill. So far as I am concerned individually, I am in favor of the fullest liberty in the House with regard to such matters. I have always thought, and I believe now, that the House is able to take care of itself if it is only allowed to act and is let alone.

In reference to the remarks of my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], I wish to say simply this: That the bill referred to by him, now pending before the District Committee, was never moved in until to-day, and that committee propose now to consider to-morrow a proposition that has been pending before them for many months. And I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Rules heard every element for and against the measure that wanted to come before them this morning. We had a session lasting for half an hour or an hour at first, and afterwards another session lasting for an hour, where all of these elements had an opportunity of being heard. All suggestions with regard to the question were heard, and the committee determined, without expressing any opinion as to what the House of Representatives ought to do in the premises or as to the merits of the proposition, to give the House an opportunity to do what it sees fit to do in the consideration of this matter as an amendment to the pending bill. If the House wants to act, this is the only way that it can act, for in no other way can it be brought to the consideration of the House and legislation had upon it during the present session, in my opinion. If an independent bill is reported, I think it will be buried on the Calendar, without a chance for final passage to the statute book.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield now three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I heartily concur in the pending motion for the adoption of the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

Referring to the plea of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], that the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to have time to consider the matter, I will call his attention to the fact that a joint resolution was presented to the House on the 15th day of December last, and referred to the committee of which he is a member—the Committee on the District of Columbia—asking the Congress to do the very same thing that is provided for in the amendment to be submitted to the District appropriation bill, and is covered by the resolution before the House.

From the 15th day of December, Mr. Speaker, until now, the Committee on the District of Columbia, with every opportunity before them to consider that resolution, have taken no action whatever respecting it; and yet the House is asked by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], at this late stage in the session, when it will be manifestly almost impossible to get an independent measure through Congress, to delay action and that nothing be done except through the Committee on the District of Columbia. But, sir, let me ask, how was the bill which we desire to repeal passed in the last Congress? It passed the House through a misconception of its provisions in consequence of misinformation to the House. I happened, Mr. Speaker, to be present when the bill was called up and unanimous consent asked for its consideration. I objected to its consideration. I was then assured by the gentleman in charge of the bill, and by others, that only thirty or forty thousand dollars was involved in it, and further that the measure had the approbation of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I am now assured by these Commissioners that they never gave their approbation to the measure, but to one that was essentially and entirely different.

This resolution, if adopted, will afford to the House the most ample opportunity to consider the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. The gentleman in charge of the bill will allow the utmost latitude of discussion, and if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] or the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] can show any reason why it should not be incorporated in the appropriation bill, the House will undoubtedly give it due weight.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not undertaken to say that these claims are well founded; I do not know. That was not the point of my objection.

Mr. SAYERS. But I find the gentleman contending for further time, and for an opportunity to have the bill considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and thus apparently for delay.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all. It can be reported to-morrow morning.

Mr. SAYERS. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, if he can show any reason why the amendment should not be incorporated upon the pending appropriation bill, I take it the House will hear the reason, and if it be a valid one, will refuse the adoption of the amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire or propose to follow the example of my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] in his criticism of any committee of this House. If I desired to do so, I should simply say that the Committee on Appropriations, in my judgment, have seen fit year after year and session after session to constitute themselves the custodians and guardians of this Government against the interests, whatever they may be, right or wrong, of every citizen of the United States who has a claim against the Government. It is a fact well known, sir, to all, and one that I have observed since I have been a member of this body, that if the Government can by any pretext prevent the payment of any claim of any of its citizens, it can find a strong and faithful ally in the Committee on Appropriations to carry out that intention without any reference to the justice of the claim.

There is but one set of people paid by the Government promptly, and that is the employees. There is another set just as deserving, possibly more so, to whom the Government has been indebted for years and years, and they have been knocking year after year and session after session at the doors of Congress, but have been prevented by the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee from recovering that which is justly due to them, and has been due for generations. It is in line with this idea that the Committee on Appropriations have to-day, by their instigation, secured the bringing in of this rule from the Committee on Rules for the purpose of speedily repealing a law which, in my judgment, gives some of the people of this city, and of the outlying country, men who believe that they have just claims against the Government, an opportunity of having those claims adjudicated, passed upon, and determined by the courts appointed by the Government to ascertain whether they are right or whether they are wrong.

Now, I ask this House, in common fairness, if there is any injustice toward the Government in allowing these people who have claims against the Government to have them considered by a court appointed by the Government to determine as to their equity, and as to whether they are just or not. That is the milk in the cocoanut. That is the whole thing.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that this act was passed with the understanding on the part of my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that only about $75,000 or $80,000 was involved. I undertake to say that if it was right to pass this act by which people having claims amounting to seventy-five or eighty thousand dollars could have their claims adjudicated in the courts, the principle is the same, even though it may turn out that a larger amount is involved. These people are entitled to have their claims adjudicated, although they may exceed that sum.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that contracts were made for work under the old régime in the District government, and I understand that the board of audit fixed the rates for which these people were to perform the labor and to carry out their contracts. In many cases the contractors abandoned their contracts before that was done, but by an agreement with the District government they resumed their work and many of them have since been paid. But there are a number who claim, under the rate fixed by the government in this city, that they are justly entitled to certain sums of money from the Government, and I understand that that bill was passed for the purpose of giving these people an opportunity to go into the courts and have their rights determined.

I understand further, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States has been assessed at what were known as board rates, that citizens have been assessed at board rates, and that any man owning a piece of property along a certain street which was improved had to pay into the treasury of the city these board rates; in other words, has been compelled to pay to the city gove nment for the work done in reference to his premises the very amounts which were fixed by this board of audit. After they have received the money from the taxpayers and from the Government, these gentlemen come forward and say that by reason of the fact that these claims are old and stale the claimants ought not to have an opportunity of doing what the law which was passed in the last Congress gives them the right to do—that is, to have their claims passed upon and the question determined as to whether there is anything due to them or not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that these claims do not amount to that vast sum of $1,400,000; that many suits were brought, but that many of these claims have been dismissed; that about 12 per cent of them have been sustained by the courts, and therefore, upon a reasonable estimate, there will not be more than $200,000 involved. But whether the amount be small or whether it be large, the only thing which this law gives these claimants the right to do is to go into the courts; and every man ought to have the right to go into court and have the merits of his claim determined. That is the reason why I have contended that the committee having jurisdiction over this matter should hear statements concerning this matter.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MEREDITH. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Under this statute, can claims be filed now?

Mr. MEREDITH. I am not advised as to that, and it is for this reason, among others, that the Committee on the District of Columbia are seeking light. We want to ascertain from the people who know the facts what is the condition of affairs with reference to these claims.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I have just examined the statute, and that under it every single one of these claims must have been filed within sixty days from the date of the passage of the act, and that, therefore, every case has been filed that can be filed under the statute.

Mr. MEREDITH. That is a greater reason why it should not be repealed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MEREDITH. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is there any dispute about the fact alleged by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], that this bill was passed under the allegation that there was not over $25,000 or $30,000 in claims that would be affected?

Mr. MEREDITH. I think he said $75,000 or $80,000. I do not know whether——

Mr. SAYERS. No; $30,000 or $40,000.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I will answer my friend frankly that I do not know; but I insist in all fairness, and I appeal to gentlemen in all frankness and in all fairness, that, whether the amount be $25,000 or whether it be $1,400,000, the principle is not altered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, the rules of this House prevent any amendment being offered to an appropriation bill changing existing law, if objected to by any member of the House, and if this rule is to be changed it can only be done by adopting a resolution reported by the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules, in their discretion, report such a resolution only in urgent cases. I undertake to say, sir, that this is an urgent case. The report of the Committee on Rules shows that they consider it an urgent case. They consider it an urgent case, not necessarily for the passage of a bill, but for consideration by the House in Committee of the Whole of a bill to repeal this statute which was put upon the statute book in the closing days of the Fifty-third Congress, without consideration and without debate, without an understanding of the bill even by the gentleman who had it in charge.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] says that this act of 1895 is intended only to give these claimants a day in court and an opportunity to get their fair demands.

Mr. Speaker, every one of these men has had day after day in court. They have had an opportunity for a hearing, have had a hearing before the board of audit, and have had a hearing before the Court of Claims under the act of 1880, and every one of them has availed himself of his opportunity. The effect of the act of 1895 is limited to those who did have those hearings, is limited to those who have accepted pay for their work and who are now claiming pay at rates over and above the lawful rates allowed by the contracts which they themselves signed, in pursuance of which they did the work, and in pursuance of which they accepted pay and signed receipts for it.

But the gentleman says the District Committee want to have an opportunity for investigation, and that it is ignorant of the merits of these claims. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the second session of the Fifty-third Congress the gentleman from Virginia himself, who is a member of that committee, introduced a bill—House bill 3134—to reopen these old, dead, and rotten claims, and to refer them to the Court of Claims, which had already considered and decided every one of them, or at least had decided every disputed point, so that those suits which had not been brought to a hearing were abandoned and dismissed by the claimants themselves. And what became of the bill? That bill, as it appears, contained at least some guaranties that the claimants should not be paid more than what was justly and equitably their due. The bill was referred to the District Commissioners for their report, and they made a report in writing, which I have before me. It was embodied in full in the House committee's report. The District Commissioners submitted to the House a substitute for the measure introduced by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MEREDITH. A Senate bill.

Mr. PITNEY. No; a House bill. The Commissioners sent with it a letter saying they had looked into the bill H. R. 3134 and that they found it needed safeguards in certain directions; that it ought not to permit a rehearing except upon certain points. With the consent of the gentleman, I will embody that part of the report in my remarks:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 14, 1894.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to make the following report on the general subject of H. R. bill 2501, "for the relief of James Walsh and others," and H. R. bill 3134, "to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes,'" which were transmitted to them, at your instance, for their views thereon.

After having given a number of hearings to representatives of the parties interested in the legislation intended by these bills, and a full consideration of the subject, the Commissioners have embodied their conclusions in a substitute bill, which they herewith submit and recommend for enactment.

The proposed substitute contemplates relief in cases only which have already been filed under said act, in which set-offs against claimants for the difference between the rates specified in their written contracts and rates paid them were ordered by the Court of Claims, or the cases withdrawn by claimants in anticipation of such allowance. It would enable that court to do justice to such claimants by making exemption from such counter claim in cases where the prices allowed and paid were "reasonable, just, and equitable," regardless of informalities.

The history of these claims is substantially as follows, etc.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. PITNEY. The Senate committee to which the Commissioners' substitute was referred reported in place of it a substitute bill of their own, striking out every guaranty that the Commissioners recommended and commanding the Court of Claims to give unlawful compensation to these contractors who had once accepted their pay in full. The report of the Senate committee contained what purported to be a copy of the Commissioners' letter, but left out the part which I have quoted, wherein the Commissioners asked for these safeguards.

Mr. MEREDITH. Who did it?

Mr. PITNEY. It was done in preparing the report of the Senate committee. I do not blame any Senator, for I do not know that it was done intentionally.

Mr. MEREDITH. I understood the gentleman to say that I had done it.

Mr. PITNEY. Oh, no. But, as I was saying, the Senate substitute, which afterwards passed both Houses and became a law, left out every guaranty, and made it mandatory upon the Court of Claims to allow to these people the "board rates," although they were always more than and sometimes two or three times as much as they were entitled to.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman who introduced the resolution, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the unanimous report submitted by the Committee on Rules upon the proposition now pending simply gives the opportunity to this House to determine whether or not it will repeal a bill under which about $1,300,000 of unworthy claims are to be imposed upon the taxpayers of this District and of the United States.

This proposition involves no discourtesy to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It simply looks to speedy and effective action, recognizing that at this late hour in the session it is impossible to pass a separate and independent remedial measure. Mr. Speaker, the act the repeal of which the House will be called upon to consider, in the event the report of the Committee on Rules is adopted, was reported adversely to this body in the Fifty-first Congress by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BURTON, and in the Fifty-second Congress it was reported to the Senate unfavorably by Senator MCMILLAN——

Mr. PITNEY. A much less harmful bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true, and I may say, in the moment of my time remaining, and after an experience of fourteen years on this floor, that in my judgment no more unjust and inequitable claims have ever challenged the attention of this House or of the American Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the method of procedure proposed by the Committee on Rules is not unprecedented, but I am very frank to say to the House that it is unusual. It is so unusual, indeed, that I would not consent to it except to meet some unusual situation. The only way to certainly protect this District from the payment of claims which are grossly unjust is the adoption of this resolution, and an emergency like that, it seems to me, amply justifies this rather extraordinary procedure.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the act which it is sought to repeal was passed under a misapprehension, and I feel absolutely certain that that is true. It was presented to the House by Judge Cobb, of Alabama, than whom a more honest man never occupied a seat on this floor; and the colloquy which took place between him and my colleague from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] plainly discloses the fact that Judge Cobb had been imposed upon by somebody. The whole colloquy reveals the fact that he was not advised as to the character of these claims. The bill was passed by unanimous consent, whereas I undertake to say that if the House had been familiar with the character of the claims the bill would have been defeated by an almost unanimous vote. So far as I am concerned, I never in my life was more certain of the iniquity and injustice of a set of claims than I am in this case.

Mr. MEREDITH. One word——

Mr. BAILEY. I can not yield. I have but a moment in which to complete my statement. I feel so confident, Mr. Speaker, that the District of Columbia ought to be protected against the payment of these claims, and that this is the only way to effectually protect it, that I am not only willing, but I am anxious to resort to even this unusual proceeding.

Mr. MEREDITH. Without hearing the other side?

Mr. BAILEY. We heard the other side in the Committee on Rules before we ever consented to this report.

Mr. PITNEY. And we can hear its advocates on the floor of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

H., somewhat numerously signed, in favor of the ratification of the arbitration treaty between this country and Great Britain, accompanied by a letter from the pastor of the church, in which he expresses the hope that my colleague and myself will not descend to a narrow partisanship in the consideration of such an important matter, concerning not only the continuance of peaceful relations between two great nations, but also of great weight in preserving peace among the nations of the earth.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The claim has been audited and allowed by the Department, and the reason why it was not paid was——

Mr. MILLS and others. All right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Because the fund out of which it was to be paid had been covered back into the Treasury.

SURVIVORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3636) to increase the pension of the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, to report it favorably with an amendment. I desire to call the attention of the senior Senator from Texas to this bill. The Senator from Texas intended to ask for its consideration when reported. I will state to the Senator that I have reported favorably the bill in which he is interested concerning the increase of pensions to the survivors of the war of 1812.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Pensions will make some statement about the bill to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. In behalf of the Senator from Texas I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I will simply state that from a letter on file and included in the report, written by the Commissioner of Pensions, it appears that there are 12 survivors of the war of 1812. Eighteen months ago ago there were 21. The survivors range from 90 to 104 years of age, and in the natural order of things the last one will soon pass away. The bill proposes to increase the pensions of these 12 old men from $12 to $30 a month, and I trust it will be done.

Mr. MILLS. I will state in addition that there is only one of them in Texas, a very old blind man, who has to be led about wherever he goes, and is dependent upon other people for help. I trust we will for the next year or two take care of the old heroes of the war of 1812. They are rapidly passing away, and in a very few years none will be left.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pensions of all surviving soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 to $30 per month in lieu of the pensions they are now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF LIQUORS IN CAPITOL BUILDING.

I will state that the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] has examined the bill and has withdrawn his objection thereto. Therefore I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HILL. I do not desire to object to the present consideration of the bill, at least not at this time, but I wish to enter a motion, on which I shall say a few words, to commit the bill to the Committee on Rules. Has the bill been read through?

Mr. MORRILL. It has been read heretofore.

Mr. HALE. If the bill gives rise to any debate whatever, I object to its being considered now, while the routine business is going on.

Mr. MORRILL. The routine business is through, I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. It is not through.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 3652) to establish a department of public health; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state that the bill is recommended by the Pan-American Medical Congress which recently convened in the City of Mexico. In introducing the bill I do not necessarily give my assent to it, but simply present it, so that it may be given consideration by the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine. I move that the bill be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the same connection I present a report of the committee of the Pan-American Medical Congress on the department of public health for the United States. They recommend the enactment of national and State laws which are very comprehensive in regard to matters of health, and which are included in this report.

I noticed the other day that President Cleveland, in addressing a medical association, suggested that if we went on improving medical matters as we had been doing of late years the only exit from this world to the next would be through the medium of old age. It occurs to me that if all the laws were enacted relating to health that the Pan-American Medical Congress has suggested in this document no man would ever be able to reach mature manhood, because we would be hampered by so many medical restrictions that we would die in self-defense. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, and that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 3653) to create the sixth judicial district in the Territory of New Mexico, the appointment of an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 3655) to restore Mrs. Elizabeth T. Anderson to the pension roll; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 3656) to admit the foreign-built steamer Soledad to American registry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3657) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to copyrights; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up House bill 7083, to which I have already referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read by title.

Mr. MORRILL. No; I make a motion to take it up at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain the motion when the morning business is concluded. The Chair lays before the Senate, as a part of the morning business, the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution instructing the Committee on Pacific Railroads to inquire and report to the Senate whether the executive department has, by existing law, authority to foreclose the Government mortgage or lien on the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific railroads, etc.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] kindly consents that I may call up the bill for action this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

SALE OF LIQUORS IN CAPITOL BUILDING.

Mr. MORRILL. I call up House bill 7083, to which I have already referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 7083) to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to know if it is the intention of the Senator from Vermont to press that bill for consideration or to refer it?

Mr. MORRILL. It has already been referred and reported. I call it up for immediate action.

Mr. MILLS. I object to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I wish merely to say that I want a direct vote upon this bill. I would not like to have it sidetracked by a motion to refer it to any committee. Undoubtedly the public are under a great misapprehension as to a saloon being at either end of the Capitol building, but there is an opportunity for visitors here to obtain ardent spirits and wines. This morning I had a letter from a gentleman of the city here stating that he recently noticed a visitor coming out from one end of the Capitol drunk.

As this bill has passed the other House, if they want it I think the Senate should not object to it. I hope that there will be no delay on the part of the Senate by a long discussion or anything of the kind, but that we shall have a vote and pass the bill. If there is a majority against it, let it be so recorded.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I myself did not object to the present consideration of this measure, and I had previously informed the Senator from Vermont that I should not. If the bill is before the Senate for any proper purpose, then I desire to make a motion to commit the bill to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MILLS. But it is not before the Senate. I have objected to its consideration, and it can only be brought before the Senate by a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the condition of the bill. The Senator from Vermont asked unanimous consent for its present consideration. An objection was interposed, when the Senator from Vermont entered a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. That motion is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is pending. The debate thus far has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I simply desire to say a few words in all deference, because no member of this Chamber fails in deference to the Senator from Vermont. The bill is not before the Senate, but there is a motion to bring it before the Senate, made by the Senator from Vermont, and I do not intend to oppose it. I am perfectly willing to allow the bill to come before the Senate, but I want to serve notice now that in my judgment it will not be properly before the Senate coming from the committee that the Senator from Vermont represents.

This bill, under every application of a rule, under every precedent known, should have been sent to the Committee on Rules. What the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has to do with this bill passes human comprehension. The bill relates directly to the culinary establishment of the Senate, and what the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has to do with the kitchen I am not informed. The Committee on Rules is charged with everything involved in the measure. The reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds seems to have been an omission upon the part of the Senate. I am sure that the venerable Senator himself will not claim jurisdiction for his committee of a question like this. It is a question for the Committee on Rules to determine, and whenever the bill shall be brought before the Senate—and I repeat I have no objection to its coming here—I shall support the motion of the Senator from New York to commit it to the only committee of the Senate that has any proper jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about this matter. It seems to me that my friend from Kentucky is wrong. A Committee on Rules means only a committee in regard to the mode and method of conducting the business of the Senate, nothing less and nothing beyond.

Mr. BLACKBURN. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is not every committee room in the Senate wing under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules, and does not every order that governs and controls the Senate wing of the Capitol building come from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. SHERMAN. All the Committee on Rules have to do is to devise rules to govern this body and regulate its procedure, and also to provide for the various committees of the body and assign different places for them. It is a mere technical objection that is made. The bill was without objection referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It relates to the use of a public building. The question is, Shall we allow any portion of this great public building to be devoted to the sale of spirituous liquors? That is all there is about it.

Upon the subject there is a general feeling throughout the country. I believe it is founded upon false ideas, because I believe there are no such irregularities practiced in this building as are alleged. I believe that they do not exist. I know myself that liquors are not sold anything like what is supposed in the various petitions sent to us. But at the same time we ought to meet this popular objection that comes to every Senator in the body. I have letters by the score and petitions by the score asking us to pass this bill upon the ground, the false ground, the foolish ground, that there is liquor sold here as at an ordinary bar. No such thing as that occurs.

But if there is any abuse of the kind, I think myself that every Senator here ought to be willing to defer to the general public opinion of the country that this building is no place where liquor should be sold or drunk or used. If people want liquor they can go outside anywhere in the city of Washington and get whisky or any kind of drink they want; but it does seem to me that it is only a fair deference to the opinion of good people in this country that here in this building liquor should be neither bought nor sold, nor used to any extent.

I hope therefore that this bill will be passed, which was reported by my honorable friend, the Nestor of this body, and who asks us to pass it. I think we ought to give him the vote to pass the bill, and not bother him with technical questions about rules or as to what particular committee the bill ought to have been sent, instead of to the committee of which he is chairman.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am not especially anxious, as a member of the Committee on Rules, to consider this question, but it must be very evident to the Senate from the remarks of the Senator from Ohio that he has not recently read the rules of the Senate. Clause 2 of Rule XXXIV reads as follows:

> It shall be the duty of the Committee on Rules to make all rules and regulations respecting such parts of the Capitol, its passages and galleries, including the restaurant, as are or may be set apart for the use of the Senate and its officers, to be enforced under the direction of the Presiding Officer.

Ever since I have been a member of the Senate the Committee on Rules has had control and charge of the Senate wing of the Capitol and the rules regulating the restaurant have been adopted by that committee, and it never has before been questioned during my service in the Senate. The keeper of the restaurant is appointed by the Committee on Rules and discharges his duties under the direction of the Committee on Rules.

While I am on my feet, I perhaps ought to say that there is a great misapprehension apparently in the public mind regarding this question, caused, I have no doubt whatever, by statements emanating from the Capitol itself and sent to various temperance organizations throughout the country as to what is the condition of affairs here in the Capitol. The Senate has now a rule of its own, and has had for a long time, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Senate wing of the Capitol building. If the House of Representatives desires to adopt a similar rule, it is certainly within its power to do it. If there are abuses existing in the House wing of the Capitol, that body certainly could look up the matter and apply the proper remedy. But so far as I am aware——

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the point of order that a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the Chair will submit the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the Senate, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him, which has been read from the desk.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7083) to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building, and for other purposes.

Mr. HILL. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Rules.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says that technically, and therefore properly, this bill should have been referred to the Committee on Rules. There is no doubt about that proposition. When the bill passed the House of Representatives and was brought to the Senate, my attention had been called to it. It was hailed as a triumph of reform (!), and I was naturally looking after a reform measure. It was not referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on motion, but was referred in the ordinary course of business and inadvertently to that committee. I was watching it, but at the time it was referred I did not happen to be present. If any Senator had then suggested to the Chair that the bill properly belonged to the Committee on Rules, unquestionably it would have gone to that committee. There is no doubt about that whatever. It is a question for the kitchen, not for the garden; it is a question for the caterer, not a question for the general superintendent of grounds; it is a question for the kitchen committee—if I may use that expression, with all due respect to the Rules Committee—rather than for the committee which has charge of all the grounds around this Capitol. Therefore we are strictly right, and it is no disrespect to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to question their jurisdiction of this matter. As a question of propriety, the bill ought to go to the Committee on Rules.

In addition to the rule which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] called to the attention of the Senate, I call attention to Rule X of the "Rules for the regulation of the Senate wing," where there are some provisions applicable to this question, declaring that the restaurant shall be under the control of the Committee on Rules and providing that certain things shall be done, all of which are to be under the direction of that committee. The rule concludes with this extensive and broad clause:

The management of the restaurant and all matters connected therewith shall at all times be subject to such further directions as the Committee on Rules may give.

The whole jurisdiction of the management of the internal affairs of the Senate restaurant belongs to the Committee on Rules, and therefore the motion I have made is perfectly legitimate and proper, and the bill ought to go to that committee.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss at any length the merits of the bill, because they are not now properly before the Senate, but I am in receipt of letters, as other Senators are, from people living way up in the North, some in my own State, calling my attention to the abomination of a bar, so called, existing here in the Capitol. Such letters have no effect upon me. There is no bar, as such, maintained here in the Capitol. There is a House restaurant and there is a Senate restaurant. The public should know that we are obliged to come here in the forenoon to attend our various committee meetings, and that we are obliged to take one meal here in the Capitol every day, and our visitors, our guests, our witnesses, and employees are obliged to get some meals here in the Capitol building, naturally so and appropriately so, and it is a question, therefore, for the Committee on Rules as to what extent and in what manner the restaurant shall be conducted.

The rules already provide upon this subject that "spirituous" liquors shall not be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant. It is a question of construction as to the effect of that provision. Does it mean that in this Capitol, where Senators are obliged to take one meal a day in order to transact the public business, no Senator shall have a glass of wine or a glass of beer? The language is:

No spirituous liquors shall be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant.

It is for the Committee on Rules to interpret this provision; it is for the Committee on Rules to give direction to the caterer in the Capitol and to regulate this whole business. It is not a subject to be dealt with by a penal statute. What is the sense of our providing a penal statute that if our servant in this Capitol, subject to our removal, violates this act, he shall be fined $500 and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, when all we have to do is to remove him? Have we not the courage to remove him; or must we pass a statute to punish our servant, our hired man, our own employee? No, Mr. President; it is a silly statute which is proposed; it is an unwise statute; it is an unnecessary statute. The wisdom of this action is very questionable.

I have received some letters on this subject, and I only desire to read one. I trust I am not to be influenced by such letters. The gentleman who writes me—and this is from my own State, too—says:

Senator DAVID B. HILL, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: I see in the newspapers that a bill prohibiting saloons in our National Capitol has been passed by the House with only 7 dissenting votes.

So much the worse for the House.

I hope that you will not only vote for this measure when it comes before the Senate, but also use your influence in the meanwhile to secure its passage and thereby raise the standard of our national honor.

[Laughter.]

Is our national honor to depend upon the fact whether we take a glass of ale or beer with one of our meals? We heard a great deal flippantly said during the recent campaign about national honor. Every time an æsthetic question or a mere question of finance, or a question of the regulation of our meals arises, some good, but misguided citizen starts the question of the national honor. Of course, you can not more effectually touch an American than when you appeal to his sense of respect for the national honor. No, there is no question of national honor involved in this proposed legislation. We say that this legislation is unnecessary. In truth and in fact there is no drunkenness in this Capitol. I have never seen in the corridors or anywhere in this Capitol a drunken man. I have not been around looking for them particularly, but I have gone in and out of the halls and corridors of this Capitol, I have been in the committee rooms, I have been all around it—not so much in the House of Representatives, but still I occasionally go over there—and I say here for the benefit of those agitators up North, in my own State and elsewhere, that it is a libel upon Congress to say that there are "saloons" maintained here in the Capitol, in the proper sense of that term, and that drunkenness prevails here. It does not.

I am not speaking so much for myself upon this question, Mr. President, because I can get along without anything to drink, except cold water, but it is a question of principle which is involved; it is a question of right; it is a question of decency; it is a question of propriety which is involved here.

I recollect we had this same question in New York when I was chief executive of that State. We had a large capitol and a large legislature, and the legislature authorized a restaurant. I suppose that probably the keeper of the restaurant sold some beer and ale, and possibly occasionally a glass of wine with the meals to our legislators. Immediately certain active, pestiferous men, anxious to regulate the morals of other people, started a crusade, crying, "What, a saloon in the capitol of the Empire State! A State disgrace." They raised again the question of honor—State honor.

I recollect I had some experience with the legislature. It first passed a law to provide that there should not be any selling of any spirituous or malt liquors, ale, wine, or beer in the capitol; and then, in order to make it perfect, they said "in any public building belonging to the State." They sent that bill to me as the chief executive. I vetoed the bill upon the broad ground that it was useless and unnecessary legislation, and upon the further ground that not only would it prohibit any drinking in the capitol, but in the executive mansion it would prevent the governor of the State on state occasions from treating his guests to a glass of wine, because that was a "public building belonging to the State;" it would prevent our soldier boys in the Soldiers' Home from having a glass of beer; it would prevent the wardens of the prisons, public officials, giving a glass of wine, or of ale, or of beer to a single guest. My veto of that bill was unanimously sustained.

Next year the legislature passed another bill. The height of the ambition of some people is to raid a restaurant in the interests of the public honor and in the interest of the public morals, which at that time were said to be involved. They are busybodies meddling with other people's business. The next bill struck out the broad provision covering all the public buildings of the State and applied only to the capitol. Then, with that fatality which often attaches to that kind of legislation—they were going to make it broad, they were not going to put in anything that could be evaded, and therefore they said there should not be sold or given away any intoxicating liquors, wines, ales, or "any other beverage containing alcoholic ingredients." They sent that bill to me, and I referred it to the State chemist to have an analysis made as to what drinks contain alcoholic ingredients. He reported that lemonade, pop, cider, small beer, ginger ale, and all the well-known and well-recognized temperance drinks contained some alcoholic ingredients; and in the interests of temperance I vetoed that bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, that ended the raid upon the "State saloon" kept in the capitol, kept there even under a Democratic administration, and that alleged saloon is to-day in full blast under the administration now in possession of the Empire State, and those people, instead of directing their attention to the capitol at Albany, are firing upon us letter after letter and petition after petition about the terrible disgrace that is going on here in this Capitol. Senators and Members of the House of Representatives may sometimes take a glass of beer, or a glass of ale, or a glass of wine with their meals in our restaurant, but it is very rarely that that even is done. I think that the right to have it should be protected; I think the right to have it with one's meals, if one wants it, should be accorded us. Can not we trust ourselves? Have the American people lost confidence in their Representatives and Senators that they can not trust them on the question of eating their meals? Mr. President, there is no wholesale or retail selling over bars here. The whole matter is exaggerated. There is nothing to it. This talk is simply for the purpose of getting up an agitation.

I have been diverted into making these remarks when the real question now involved is that arising on my motion, and nothing else. Where does this bill belong? Has there been any hearing before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds? I think not. Have the Committee on Rules been asked to appear before that committee to state the existing regulations? I think not. I have not seen it in the newspapers anywhere, and they usually keep track of such things. Has the keeper of the restaurant been called before the committee to state how the matter is now regulated? I think not. Is there a report accompanying the bill giving any reasons for this action? No.

In justice to ourselves, in justice to public decency, would it not be well, when a favorable report or any report is made in regard to this bill, to have a written report stating just what is done here, just what is tolerated, so as to show how senseless these cries are? I think it would be well to have such a report as part of our archives, and then let the people living hundreds of miles away from here, who are lying awake nights because they think there is some wrong being perpetrated in regard to the taking of something intoxicating with our meals, be pacified; and let them understand that there is nothing in all this clamor.

My motion to refer ought to prevail; it ought to prevail substantially by unanimous consent. This bill, concededly improperly referred in the first place, should be referred to the Committee on Rules. Let us trust that committee, who have charge of the matter under the rules of the Senate. That is where this bill should be referred.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything about this matter, but I shall vote for the bill and vote against its reference now to the Committee on Rules. It seems to me that this is a very simple question. It is not a question of prohibition. I myself am an antiprohibitionist. It is not a question of teetotalism. I myself am not a teetotaler. I make no pretensions in either direction. The bill involves no theories regarding governmental interference with private property; but it involves alone the management of a public building. It is not even a question as to the abstinence or nonabstinence of United States Senators; for United States Senators are not the only persons who have admission to this building, and the House and Senate restaurants are open to every visitor. Crowds of persons of every age, sex, and condition come to this Capitol. Every day hundreds of ladies from different parts of the Union throng the precincts of this great building.

I shall vote for this bill just as I should vote for one protecting a schoolhouse or protecting a church or protecting any other special building from the supposed evil of the use of intoxicating liquors.

Sir, it has been said that there is a rule of this Senate which forbids the sale or use of intoxicating liquors in this building. If so, it is the first time I ever heard of it. I have personal knowledge that, if such be the rule, it is violated constantly.

I do not expect any extraordinary results from the passage of this bill. It is not expected that any great revolution in the morals of Senators, or in the morals of the people, will be created by it; but it is a deference which we ought to extend to the views of a large portion of our people, who think that the public buildings of the country, at least, ought to be protected from the annoyances of the liquor traffic. I think they are right to that extent.

It is only a few steps to places where gentlemen can buy intoxicating liquors if they desire. This bill does not involve anything except possibly a matter of convenience, and on account of the numbers who come here, women and children and people of that kind, I think this bill ought to pass.

It is not a complex proposition, which needs to be considered time and again by any committee of this body. It is simply a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in this Capitol and on the public grounds surrounding this building. Why should that question be considered by a committee so seriously and so long? I see no reason for it, sir. It is now before us. Perhaps in the first place it might have been referred to the Committee on Rules; but it was not so referred—it went to another committee. I am not much of a stickler anyway regarding the jurisdiction of these committees. They are but auxiliary to the business of this Senate. This bill has come back to the Senate, reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Everybody understands it, and we can dispose of it in fifteen minutes. I think we ought to take a vote without further delay.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say in regard to the reference of this bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that I had no part in sending it to that committee. I do not know who had. So far as I am concerned, in moving it at the present time, it is by mere accident. On account of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] being absent, it simply devolved on me as a duty to present the bill, and I felt it incumbent upon me to discharge that duty. Therefore I shall ask a vote on the question of reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to refer the bill to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, just a word before the Chair puts the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I conceive that the sensitiveness of Senators to get rid of this bill is undue. The Committee on Rules has a certain jurisdiction conferred upon it, but that does not oust the jurisdiction of the Congress; it does not do away with the jurisdiction of the Legislature of the United States. This is a public building belonging to the people of this country. The Committee on Rules of the Senate is the medium through which the Congress of the United States exercises jurisdiction by way of enforcing rules in this body; and surely the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules of the Senate does not extend beyond the enforcement of order and the enforcement of rules established by the Senate. It does not extend to the House wing; it does not extend to the grounds outside of this building. What the Committee on Rules is expected to do is to enforce whatever the Senate or the Congress may determine ought to be enforced.

Now, there is a standing rule of this body, I understand—I think I have read it—which prohibits, or pretends to prohibit, the sale of liquor in the Senate restaurant. I think that is true. But here comes along a proposition to pass a bill. Congress, exercising its jurisdiction over one of its public buildings, proposes to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building of the United States, in the Capitol Grounds, and in other public buildings of the District of Columbia; it is a bill general in its character so far as jurisdiction over the District of Columbia is concerned; and it seems to me that it is futile, almost childish, if that is a parliamentary term, for Senators to insist that a bill of this character must go to the Committee on Rules and have the opinion of that committee before the Senate can take jurisdiction or before Congress can take jurisdiction. It is preposterous to begin with. Who supposes we should ever have any report from the Committee on Rules with respect to this measure?

What rule of the body is there, what act of Congress is there, what rule of parliamentary procedure is there, that we are required to refer any of our bills to a committee? One of our rules, the third paragraph of Rule XIV, provides:

> No bill or joint resolution shall be committed or amended until it shall have been twice read, after which it may be referred to a committee.

There is no rule requiring that a bill or joint resolution shall be referred to a committee except by a vote of the Senate. I remember a short time ago that after discussing a joint resolution, which had been read twice, I asked that it might be placed on the Calendar, and the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] objected to that proceeding and desired to have it referred to a committee. Simply to accommodate that Senator, who has always been so respectful and courteous to me, I yielded to him; but there is nothing in the rules of the Senate which requires a bill to go to any committee. When a question comes before the Senate in which the people of the United States in large proportion are interested, not only quiescently and receptively, but actively, and while petitions are coming in here by the hundred day after day, week after week, month after month, session after session, and year after year, asking for such legislation as this—when such a question comes face to face with the American Senate, it seems to me we ought to be willing to accord that much to the temperance sentiment of the United States and to the Christian sentiment of the United States. This is a Christian country, Mr. President. Our people are a moral people, and whenever they are brought face to face with a question of this kind, they are invariably upon the right side of it. Here in the Capitol building, where the laws of the country are made, where the strongest and best men of the country are presumed to be sent by a wise and considerate constituency, we are asked not to prohibit men and women from drinking their liquors when they want to, not asked that men and women shall be prohibited from having beer or wine or whisky or gin at their meals when they desire, but that no intoxicating liquors shall be sold in the Capitol building of the United States of America.

I hope, Mr. President, that this motion to refer will be defeated, and that, like men, as well as like Senators, we shall meet this question face to face.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to refer the bill to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether he is prepared to amend the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to amending it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator is not prepared to amend it, I shall vote to refer it, for the very simple reason that I always vote for the restriction of the sale of intoxicating liquors. I am willing to vote to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within the Capitol building or on the Capitol Grounds, but I can not vote for the bill in its present language. I wish sometimes that our temperance reformers would consult lawyers before they draw bills to make crimes. The language of the bill is:

> That hereafter it shall be unlawful * * * to sell, dispense, or otherwise dispose of intoxicating liquors of any kind, or any compound or preparation thereof, either in the Capitol building or upon any part of the public grounds.

Now, what does "dispense intoxicating liquors" mean? What does "dispose of intoxicating liquors" mean? There are three objectionable acts. There is the sale of liquor; there is the giving away of liquor, and there is the drinking of liquor, and a bill which makes it a penal offense to do a thing in the Capitol building should be specific. A bill that authorizes the constables of Washington to come up here and take individuals from the Capitol and take them before the police court of the District of Columbia should be specific.

If we mean to punish the selling of liquor, let us say so. If we mean to punish the giving away of liquor, let us say so. If we mean to punish the drinking of liquor, let us say so. Or, if we mean that no medical prescription with liquor in it, and certainly a medical prescription calling for alcohol as an ingredient is covered by the language, "any compound or preparation thereof," shall, under any circumstances, be administered within the precincts of the Capitol without its being a crime, then let it be so stated in the bill. But do not let us have, under the guise of temperance reform or as impediments upon a wise law to exclude the sale of liquor from the Capitol, a badly drawn bill voted upon which does not mean what we say, for I do not believe it is the intention or desire of Senators that under no imaginable circumstances shall a physician's prescription which contains alcohol be given or used in this building. The only physician on this floor is my respected colleague, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and if any of us should be taken sick to-day and he were called upon to prescribe for us on this floor, he would be guilty of a crime if he put any alcohol in the prescription.

In all seriousness, Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Vermont, representing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or possibly the able Committee on Finance, or if not either of those committees, then the Committee on Rules, ought to take this bill and make it a bill which does what it professes to do, what its framers want it to do—prohibit the sale of liquor within the Capitol and the Capitol Grounds—and then I will vote for it, but I will not stultify myself by voting for it in this shape.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to my colleague that if he were to call upon me for a prescription and I should write one, I would not send him to the chef of the restaurant, the Sergeant-at-Arms, or the keeper of the restaurant, but to a licensed pharmacist to fill his prescription.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator does me an injustice. Would the Senator, if anyone should be taken sick in the Capitol, have him wait to have a restorative drop administered until he sends out to the nearest drug store? I do not believe that the Senator, any more than myself, wants to make it a crime to administer, within the limits of the Capitol, a physician's prescription with alcohol in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I merely suggest to my colleague, in addition, that in my opinion the average United States Senator, even though he comes from the prohibition State of New Hampshire, if he wants a restorative drop, will not find it necessary to go to a physician to get it.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I have been in doubt as to how my vote should be cast upon this important bill, but the observations of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] have caused me to reflect, and the picture that has risen in my mind upon his suggestion of what might be the possible state of affairs in the Senate if the bill should be adopted as a part of the law has decided me to vote against the bill. That picture would be of this kind: At noon hour there would be a string of Senators passing in front of the seat of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], each one receiving his little billet-doux that authorized him to partake of that liquid refreshment which could not be partaken of without such authorization, and I do not believe that the annoyance to which the Senator from New Hampshire would be subjected should be considered for a moment in view of the importance of the exigency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Rules, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called.) I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCBRIDE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I take the liberty of transferring my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I should like to ask his colleague if he is able to inform me?

Mr. MCBRIDE. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am not informed as to how my colleague would vote on this question.

Mr. VILAS. I will therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I am paired generally with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I do not know how he would vote on this question——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The pair has been transferred, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. Then I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, as I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is otherwise paired.

Mr. BERRY. Is the Senator from Connecticut paired with any other Senator?

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague is paired with the Senator from Arkansas who is speaking.

Mr. BERRY. Very well. The Senator from Connecticut is paired with me.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did not the Senator from Arkansas so understand it?

Mr. BERRY (after having voted in the negative). He is paired with me. I withdraw my vote. I would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. MORRILL. I have withdrawn my vote.

Mr. BERRY. If my pair has been transferred, I have not been informed in regard to it. Does the Senator from Connecticut know how his colleague would vote?

Mr. HAWLEY. He would vote "nay," I have no doubt.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator is sure of that, I will cast my vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. BERRY. Then I will vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should like to have the authority for that statement.

Mr. BERRY. I withdraw my vote, if any question is raised about it.

Mr. MORRILL. I have withdrawn my vote, as I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. PASCO. I wish to state that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] asked me to see that he was paired, and I had arranged the matter with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], supposing it was in accordance with his views.

Mr. BATE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN]. He gives me liberty upon motions like the pending one, not political in their nature, to vote as I please. I have voted "nay," and I will let my vote stand, but I desired to explain it.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired generally with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. I am informed by his colleague that if he were present he would vote in the affirmative. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand, although the junior Senator from Rhode Island is absent.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] has announced that he arranged another pair for the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] by his direction, and I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] informed me before he went away that he was paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. I think he so understands it.

Mr. PASCO. He very likely made the arrangement after he saw me, then, and I will withdraw the action I have taken.

Mr. COCKRELL (to Mr. PASCO). You have a right to pair the Senator from Connecticut with any other Senator. That right is always exercised in the Senate, and it has never before been denied.

Mr. TELLER. Let it stand.

Mr. PASCO. I think it is a matter which his colleague ought to determine.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it stand.

Mr. BERRY. I wish it specifically understood how it is. I desire to keep faith with the Senator from Connecticut. If he authorized the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to arrange a pair for him with another Senator, I want to let my vote stand. If he is not otherwise paired, I will withdraw my vote and announce that I would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no doubt that the absent Senator from Connecticut considers himself paired with the Senator from Arkansas. He told me so distinctly not long before he left town.

Mr. SHERMAN. How would he vote on this question?

Mr. HAWLEY. I only know his general principles on that question. I do not know how he would vote on the motion to refer.

Mr. BERRY. In view of the statement made by the colleague of the Senator from Connecticut, I withdraw my vote. I want to observe the pair.

Mr. FAULKNER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and in order to enable my vote to stand, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. BLANCHARD (after having voted in the negative). I have already cast my vote, but I observe that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMITH. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and wish to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NELSON. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri

[Mr. VEST]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], and vote "nay." I understand that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] being paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who is absent, and I being paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], we have arranged to transfer our pairs, which pairs the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], with whom I am paired, with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], with whom the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is paired. That permits the Senator from Minnesota and me to vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Louisiana know how either of the Senators who are absent would vote?

Mr. GALLINGER. A half dozen transfers have been made on the other side without any question——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask, under the transfer of pairs, that my name be called. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that two absent Senators are being paired, without knowing how either would vote upon this question, and the Senator is getting two votes against this proposition. It is not a matter of any consequence to me, but it is obvious that if the two absent Senators should happen to vote the same way, they would lose their votes by this arrangement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest, in response to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], that at least a half dozen pairs have been made with Senators upon the other side whose opinions could not have been known.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Right here I protest against transfers of pairs with absent Senators unless some Senator in his place will state how the absent Senator would vote if present.

Mr. CULLOM and Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I protest against counting any votes so cast.

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the negative). If any objection is made to the transfer, I am willing to withdraw my vote. I do not want to have any question about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Minnesota to withdraw his vote?

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so noted.

Mr. BLANCHARD (after having voted in the negative). It is a very common occurrence in the Senate of the United States for one Senator to transfer his pair, but since the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has withdrawn his vote, it forces me to do the same. I ask leave to withdraw my vote. I stand paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 30; as follows:

So the motion to refer was rejected.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, this great moral (!) question is now clearly before the Senate. It will be in order now for Senators who have voted for prohibition to proceed to their lunches and take a glass of beer. The theory upon which this bill is framed, if it has any theory at all, is a most vicious one. It would not be parliamentary for me to say that it is a cowardly bill, and therefore I do not say it. I would not say that "conscience does make cowards of us all." Neither would I say that an alleged public opinion makes cowards of us all.

There is not a single Senator here who does not know that drinks are to be obtained in the Capitol hereafter as they have been heretofore, and it is expected. But we are to satisfy our consciences, we are to satisfy an alleged public opinion, by putting a very strict law upon the statute book and then do as we please as to obeying and enforcing it.

Mr. President, I am opposed to that sort of proceeding. I am opposed to that sort of hypocrisy. I am opposed to that sort of legislation. I am opposed to the proceedings which are witnessed in some States where strict prohibition laws are passed to satisfy an alleged public sentiment, and the laws not enforced and not intended to be enforced. And men go to bed and sleep easy after they have passed those bills.

Mr. President, what is the situation presented here? Who sells liquor in the Capitol? Nobody except the caterer of either the Senate or the House of Representatives. You are not legislating for anybody around the corner of the grounds. There are no places that sell liquor there. You are not legislating for committee rooms. Nobody sells there.

Nobody pretends that there has ever been any liquor sold there. The only sort of pretense is that in the restaurants of the two Houses Senators in getting their dinners, or guests who visit the Capitol occasionally, may purchase liquors with their meals. That is all. To stop it, what do you propose to do? The manly thing, the proper thing, would be to summon before the appropriate committee the caterer and ask him, "By what right do you violate—if it is a violation—the rules of the Senate?" and dismiss him. Oh, no. Where is the Senator who proposes to do that? If Senators are so wrought up over this question, filled with this sentiment, filled with this narrowness that seems to prevail, are they going to carry out their conscientious convictions by proceeding to make a complaint against the caterers? No. Nobody will do it. Not a man around this circle proposes to do it. It seems that they prefer that we should pass a strict statute that the caterer shall be arrested; that the caterer shall be fined; that the caterer shall be punished—unloading everything on our servant.

Mr. President, with all due respect to Senators, I say it is hypocrisy. I say it is unwise and vicious legislation, because it is not proposed to meet the difficulty. In the first place, no matter what committee reported the bill (that question has been disposed of), the Senate has seen fit to decide that the provisions of the rules that give jurisdiction to the Committee on Rules to dispose of this question do not mean anything. They have seen fit to decide that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has jurisdiction of this question, properly so, and I bow with all due respect to the decision of the Senate. There is something about this question that seems to impel Senators to ride over rules. The distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] seems to be crouching for fear of a great cyclone of public opinion which he can not resist. A Senator who can not stand up in an emergency in reference to a foolish, silly, unjust clamor ought not to take refuge in passing a statute to expose his own servant to prosecution, and protecting himself.

Mr. President, what are the rules of this body? What has been intended to be done?

"No spirituous liquors shall be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant," is the language of the Senate rule.

That does not exclude malt liquors. It never was intended to—never since these old moss-covered rules were first enacted. It was always expected that you could take beer—malt liquors—with your meals or otherwise. Who objects to it? Is there a great moral question involved? It is ridiculous, absurd, preposterous.

Let me analyze the argument of my good temperance friend from Texas. He says the Capitol belongs to the people of the country. That is true. The District belongs to the people of the country. This little 10 miles square—not exactly square after all, but they call it square—belongs to the country. Upon the same principle we ought to have a prohibition District. How prohibition would diminish the crowds on inauguration day, for which we have made such great preparations! I heard it argued a year or two ago that there should be no liquor sold in the District of Columbia. Some people propose to set the District apart as the model town of the country; put in force here prohibition laws, the narrow prohibition laws under which they fine people in some States three or four thousand dollars and send them to prison for a violation of the excise or prohibition laws. Before this debate is over I will send for that case in the State of Vermont, decided afterwards by the Supreme Court a few years ago. I have no sort of respect for a public sentiment that sanctions such laws.

A man living in New York State sent over into Vermont to be sold a few kegs of beer by the express company under a C. O. D. receipt, and the express company collected the money and forwarded it to New York. It was claimed that this was a violation of the excise laws of prohibition Vermont. Not supposing it was—supposing it to be permitted by the interstate-commerce laws—not supposing he had violated any law, a citizen of my State went on a Fourth of July celebration, I think, to celebrate over in Vermont, and they arrested him under an indictment which had been found there. The authorities from Vermont proceeded to try him, convicted him, sentenced him to pay a fine of a certain amount—I believe about a thousand dollars—and if the fine (the precise amount I do not now recollect) was not paid it would keep him in the penitentiary for thirty or forty years for a violation of the excise laws or the prohibition laws of the State of Vermont. Perhaps Senators would like to have some such laws in this District, so that we should have a model government. Murder in some States is nothing compared with a violation of excise laws. I recollect what occurred after the case had gone to the Supreme Court of the United States. I will get the volume, for I want to read the opinion of Justice Field. Although I think he dissented, while the other judges held that possibly the conviction would have to be sustained under the theory of State rights, yet he denounced such a decision as an outrage upon the individual liberty of the citizen, and declared such a sentence to be unworthy of an American court. Justice Field expressed his opinion of such sort of laws. Murder is respectable compared to the violation of the excise laws. Burglaries amount to nothing. All sorts of crime are nothing compared with the selling or taking of drinks contrary to the excise laws or contrary to the prohibition laws of some States.

Mr. President, I am opposed to such sort of narrow legislation. I believe in the personal liberty of the citizen. I believe in the right of a man to drink and eat and wear whatsoever he pleases, subject only to such reasonable regulations as the welfare of the whole community may demand. All else is tyranny; all else is oppression; all further is an exhibition of intermeddling unworthy of an American legislator.

Your rules, your written rules, never contemplated but that you could sell lager beer. But now, by this statute, you propose to prevent ale and you propose to prevent beer being sold or drunk. I am not so certain but that under some constructions your proposed statute would prevent cider from being sold.

Dispose of intoxicating liquors of any kind, or any compound or preparation thereof—

In cider there are ingredients of alcohol—or any compound or preparation thereof.

I am prepared to say, as a lawyer, if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the physician of this body, should prescribe for a sick Senator here by giving him a glass of wine, under the terms of the bill, if it should become a law, he could be successfully prosecuted and fined $500. The very words "otherwise dispense" are used. That prevents a dispensary—prevents a liquor prescription. They do not propose to have Senators taken sick. Senators must always be well. They put in the very words to stop a prescription of any kind of liquor for a Senator.

Mr. President, this is ridiculous legislation; it is unnecessary and puritanical legislation. It comes from where? From this District. Who is demanding it here? Nobody especially. This District can kick up a muss as quick as any 10 miles square in the United States that I know of, but nobody especially here is demanding it. Where are they? Why, people are sending letters, telegrams, and petitions here, people who have never visited the capital in their lives and never expect to. They are the people who are lying awake nights, always for fear of the Pope. There are lots of them all over the country. They begin to talk to you when you meet them in some rural portions of our country and tell you about what a fearful thing the power of the Pope is. The next time you meet other people they begin to tell you about the great dangers to the American people because lager beer is sold in the saloons of the Capitol. The saloons of the Capitol! What rubbish!

Mr. President, you propose to make it a crime "to sell, dispense, or otherwise dispose of."

I have listened with great attention to the remarks of the junior Senator from New Hampshire, who, although a Prohibitionist as he is, tinctured with prohibition, brought up with prohibition, covered all over with prohibition sentiment inground in him, yet says he can not vote for this proposed legislation. He has some sense, and a good deal of sense. When he says he can not support the measure, hailing from a prohibition State, I think that Senators who represent liberal communities, noted for their liberal views, certainly should stop long enough to criticise the bill; they should stop long enough to examine it; they should stop long enough to see whether it expresses their real sentiments or not.

Pass the bill if you can, if you wish to do so, but what prevents a constable of the District of Columbia from walking in here and seizing the person of the venerable Senator from Vermont on a charge of violating this law and taking him to the police court of the District of Columbia? You have in this measure surrendered the privileges guaranteed to you by your Constitution, granted to you by the common law, granted to you by what is called parliamentary rule, namely, the exemption of the person of Senators from arrest. Your parliamentary exemption privilege is gone.

What a fine spectacle it would be some morning when my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], at some time in the distant future, on the Nicaraguan Canal bill, shall suggest the absence of a quorum, to discover that half of the Senators are in the police court for a violation of the excise law. You are exempt now. There is no law that can take you upon any sort of charge from this Chamber when you are engaged in legislation—your persons are sacred—but you propose to pass a law that enables the constable of this city, in the interest of public morality (!), to deplete the Senate, to do away with your majority, and virtually dissolve your Congress—a power never before surrendered by legislators, by members of Parliament, or any other body possessing the same powers that we possess. Even in cases of treason and felony and breaches of the peace the privileges of members of Parliament extend, and the same rule applies to us. They could not take us for treason out of this body, they could not take us for felony, they could not take us for a breach of the peace. But it is proposed that they can take us from here for a violation of the excise law of the District. Of course the reason for the exemption is that you could break up a majority of Parliament or a majority of Congress under false pretenses.

Mr. MILLS. You could in that way deprive the people of any community of the right of representation.

Mr. HILL. There are a dozen reasons upon which this personal privilege of Senators has been sustained from the foundation of the Government, but we must surrender it because of the great moral (!) pressure away back a hundred, two hundred, a thousand miles from here.

Mr. President, this sort of unreasonable legislation will not answer. It has not been well conceived, as I said in my opening remarks. Who drew this bill? Nobody knows. What lawyer is responsible for it here? What Senator has given us an exposition of what you can do under it? There is no report accompanying it. It was drawn up, possibly, by some society somewhere or other whose members have very vague and crude notions of law.

Mr. President, beyond all this is the hypocrisy involved in this sort of thing. The remedy is in our own hands. If we want to accomplish what we pretend we do, it is easy enough to pass a resolution here instructing the Committee on Rules to dismiss the keeper of your restaurant. That is one way to proceed. Oh, no; nobody proposes to do it, but by this sort of legislation it is proposed to escape responsibility for ourselves.

I care nothing personally about this question. Whether I am ever here or not in the future (and I do not expect to be here), your restaurant will keep on just the same; and when I shall visit my fellow-Senators in the years to come, to pay you a friendly visit, this same old restaurant will be in full blast as now. I would rather state frankly what we intend. You intend that matters shall continue as they are. This statute, if enforced at all, will be enforced against your servant. It will not remedy the evil. This same question was raised years ago. I have read of it in the reports of the proceedings of Congress. It always results in the same way. A spasmodic effort was made to do something, and in the end it resulted in nothing. It failed because it ought to fail.

Now, I oppose this measure, not that I ever took a drink of liquor in this Capitol, or ever expect to do so, but I oppose it from principle. It is said the people will be contaminated if they come here. Why, on all your public thoroughfares, on your lines of conveyance, on your palace cars, they sell wines and ales. They sell wine and ale and beer on your steamboats. They sell them in your hotels. They sell them in your restaurants, at your depots, throughout the country. Why draw the line here, except that there is a clamor for it upon the part of men who do not stop to think what they demand?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3247.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a question of privilege and present a conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for that purpose.

ANNIE E. NOLAN.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2129) granting an increase of pension to Annie E. Nolan, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted insert "$40;" and the House agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
JNO. L. MITCHELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

BENSON WOOD,
S. S. KIRKPATRICK,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to go on with the consideration of the conference report upon the immigration bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would yield to me merely that I may make a request.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the resolutions I submitted relative to the Pacific railroads may be passed over without losing their place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURSTON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will excuse me a moment, in connection with the Pacific railroad resolutions, which are to go over by unanimous consent, I give notice that I shall ask unanimous consent to-morrow morning immediately after the transaction of the routine business to continue my remarks upon the resolutions. I should like to complete what I have to say without a greater intermission between parts of my remarks.

GASPAR BETANCOURT.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to offer a resolution on which I will ask unanimous consent that present action may be taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if it is not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether Gaspar Betancourt, a citizen of the United States, is held in prison by the Spanish authorities in Cuba, and the grounds of the arrest and detention.

And that he will also inform the Senate whether the release of said Betancourt has been demanded, and when and how often such demand has been repeated, and what answer has been made to the same.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, if the Senator from Alabama would have no objection, to have the resolution first go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I will state my reason. I am quite sure the Senator would not move any such resolution without grave reasons, and my reason relates rather to a general policy and not at all to this particular resolution.

A practice has grown up in the Senate, when complaints come of the treatment of our citizens abroad, to move resolutions of this kind of inquiry and to pass them as a matter of course. I happen to know that in one very important instance the State Department had nearly effected the release of an American citizen abroad when a resolution of inquiry passed by the Senate disturbed the foreign government, thinking that they seemed to be yielding to some menace, and prevented the accomplishment of what otherwise would have been done.

I am sure that what I say does not apply in the least to the pending resolution: but it seems to me, unless there be some very pressing exigency, these matters which relate to diplomacy should always go to the committee of which the Senator is so distinguished a member, and that the committee should have an opportunity of some formal inquiry of the Department of State before public action is taken by the Senate.

I will not interpose an objection to the resolution, but I thought it proper to make this observation, for I am sure that sometimes such resolutions have disturbed the action which was going on to a successful issue.

Mr. MORGAN. If I should be required to state the sources of my information about this business, they would not be in the slightest degree discredited by the Senate of the United States. I do not believe that I am permitted to give the name of the gentleman who has made to me a very important communication on this subject, which included a statement that this old gentleman, who is seventy-odd years of age, who has been twenty-five years of his life in New Orleans, and is a merchant there, has been arrested and committed to prison. The Government of the United States, through its consul-general, has made three or four demands for his release and also for information in respect to the grounds of the accusation, etc., but he is intercommunicado; that is, they will not allow anyone to approach him at all to find out what he was arrested for or what condition he is in.

I thought it was my duty to present the resolution in this form, leaving it to the President of the United States to give us the information according to his judgment as to whether it would be injurious to the public service. If such arrests have been made, I desire to call attention to the fact that we have a statute, the number of which is 2001 in the Revised Statutes, which requires the President of the United States, of his own motion, in cases of the kind suggested in the resolution, to give immediate information to the Congress of the United States. I have two or three times called attention to that statute and predicated resolutions upon it. I tried to get information in regard to the Competitor affair more than a year ago based upon that statute. It is simply a dead letter on the law book; that is all of it. The object, of course, in communicating such information to Congress is disclosed in the latter clause of the statute, which prohibits the President of the United States from using any force for the purpose of releasing a person thus imprisoned, as that would amount to an act of war, and requires him to make presentation immediately of all the facts to Congress, so that the war-making power of this country may determine what its duty is.

I am conscious of the fact that that statute has affirmed in favor of Congress the proposition that it is the sole war-making power, and I think it is the duty of every Senator here who has information he believes to be correct upon a case of this kind, finding that the Executive does not act, does not refer the facts to us, makes no mention of it at all, to offer his resolutions in order to gain that information and, if possible, get the executive branch of the Government to move in the direction of discharging its ordinary statutory duty in the matter. That is the reason why I moved the resolution.

I can only say that the gentleman who made this communication to me is a man of very high character, a citizen of New Orleans, and I have no doubt but that his statement is true. If the Senate thinks it best to refer the resolution, of course let it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. At the same time, there is a great deal of suffering going on now upon the part of American citizens, some at Ceuta, some at Habana, some in the fortress at Cabanas, some at Pine Island, some at various other places. A great many Americans are suffering unjustly and suffering torture under the Spanish persecutions in Cuba. I am a little restive about it, and very desirous to be somewhat active in bringing this subject to public attention, and especially to the attention of the Executive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to call up now the conference report on the immigration bill. I do not wish, as the Senator from Alabama knows, to do anything to interfere with the consideration of the Nicaragua Canal bill, but this measure being in its last stage, I am very anxious to dispose of it at the earliest possible moment. Of course it does not displace the unfinished business, as it is a conference report; and I am in hopes that we may be able to get action upon it very soon and get it out of the way not only of the Nicaragua Canal bill, but of all the business of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Massachusetts will occupy probably but a few moments of the attention of the Senate on the conference report, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside informally for the purpose of enabling the Senator to have that subject taken up and disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLS. If it requires unanimous consent, as I am opposed to the bill, I can not give it.

Mr. LODGE. It does not require unanimous consent. I will say a conference report is privileged.

Mr. MILLS. A conference report is privileged in the other House, both to be presented and considered; but I am informed that in this body it is different—that it is only privileged for presentation.

Mr. LODGE. A conference report is a privileged one, and I move to take it up.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to again utter my protest against the idea being entertained for a moment that a conference report loses its privilege at any stage or under any circumstances.

Mr. HALE. It never has in the business of the Senate, that I know of, been considered that a conference report is not privileged until it is completed; otherwise we should be unable to do business in the last thirty days of a session.

Mr. DANIEL. After such a report is taken up it is privileged.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN] to be willing that the conference report shall be taken up without regard to this question; but that must not be taken as an admission that a conference report can ever cease to be a question of privilege.

Mr. LODGE. Of course a conference report can not lose its privilege; but I do not desire to bring about an argument as to the very large question of privileged reports. There is no question in my mind that you can not divest the question of its privilege at any time. The Senator from Alabama in charge of the bill which is the unfinished business made no objection, and I supposed it was not necessary to go to a vote upon it.

Mr. MILLS. Do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts wishes the Senate to recommit the report?

Mr. LODGE. I may desire to recommit it or not, but I am not at liberty to say at present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that objection is interposed to unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I think the objection has been withdrawn, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to withdraw the objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again submit the question. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I made no request for unanimous consent. The request was made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VILAS. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Alabama please restate his request?

Mr. MORGAN. I asked unanimous consent that the regular order pending before the Senate, the Nicaragnan Canal bill, might be laid aside informally without prejudice, to enable the Senator from Massachusetts to call up and have disposed of the conference report on the immigration bill, I understanding that he intended to be very brief about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Texas to object to the request?

Mr. MILLS. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

Mr. LODGE. Then I move to take up the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. If that motion succeeds, Mr. President, do I understand that it will displace the regular order, the Nicaraguan Canal bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that for the time being it would.

Mr. LODGE. It would during its own consideration, of course; but it would not displace it as the unfinished business. A conference report can not do that, because it can be moved to be taken up at any time.

Mr. GORMAN. That is the very question I raise now with the Chair, and we ought to have it decided at this time. I differ very decidedly with the Senator from Massachusetts, and I raise the point, so as to have the decision of the Chair upon it.

Mr. LODGE. If I may be heard on that point of order——

Mr. HOAR. That point of order does not come up now, but will come up after the measure in charge of my colleague is up.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit the point to the decision of the Chair, whether, if the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts be adopted, it will displace the regular order?

Mr. LODGE. May I be heard upon that point of order, if the Senator from Maryland is through?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if we take up the conference report now, while we are considering it this afternoon we are not considering the Nicaraguan bill, that is obvious; but in the sense that the Senator makes the question, I suppose it is as well known to him as it is to me that a privileged matter like a conference report, if it is not finished to-day, does not displace the unfinished business to-morrow, because, being a privileged matter, it can always come up on motion, and a motion is always in order to take it up. It would not put an end to the unfinished business. You can not, as I understand, make a conference report the unfinished business of the Senate because you can move at any time to take it up.

Mr. CHANDLER. So that it does not displace the Nicaraguan bill.

Mr. LODGE. It does not displace that bill from its position as unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. As would a motion to proceed to the consideration of another bill.

Mr. LODGE. It does not displace that bill from its position as would the adoption of a motion to proceed to the consideration of another bill, as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests.

Mr. HALE. Put it in another way. A conference report being a privileged matter, and this report having been presented yesterday and considered as a privileged matter, it did not then displace the unfinished business. To-day, it having gone over, the Senator from Massachusetts in charge of the report makes his privileged motion to proceed to its consideration, and it will no more displace the unfinished business to-day, Mr. President, than did the presentation of the report yesterday—it is only for the time being, like a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business or whatever it may be. It is in the nature of privileged matter, not coming within the ordinary business of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me if the rule is read in regard to confe ence reports it may elucidate this whole question. I ask that the rule may be read from the desk.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, I think the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will examine the rule, upon a moment's reflection, will understand that a conference report is privileged to be made at any time without displacing the current business; but, after being made and laid upon the table, if a motion is subsequently made and adopted to proceed to its consideration it displaces whatever is then pending in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Maryland is wrong in regard to that.

Mr. GORMAN. Here is the rule.

Mr. STEWART. Let us hear the rule.

Mr. GORMAN. The rule is as follows:

> The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

So that it takes a motion to consider a conference report.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to say——

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I have the floor, Mr. President, have I not?

Mr. GORMAN. I do not know how the Senator obtained the floor. The Chair recognized me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Maryland addressed the Chair, and yielded to another Senator, who subsequently addressed the Chair.

Mr. GORMAN. I will yield to the Senator if he is desirous to be heard at this time, as he is chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ALDRICH. All I was about to say was that it requires no motion at all to take up a conference report. I think the trouble is in regard to the technical method in which this matter has been approached. The Senator from Massachusetts having the conference report in charge can undoubtedly at any time call it up for consideration. If objection is raised and the question is put to the Senate by the presiding officer, "Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report?" it is not a motion to displace the unfinished business or to make the conference report the unfinished business. It is simply a particular method prescribed by the rules to get a privileged question before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is the whole thing, Mr. President. I called up the report as a privileged matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the status of this motion as the Chair understands it. The request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] for unanimous consent was denied. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] then entered a motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report. That is the pending motion now before the Senate. A question is raised as to the effect of that motion upon what is known as the unfinished business, being the Nicaraguan Canal bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Massachusetts, instead of making the motion, had asked the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report——

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I at first did.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then, as a matter of course, the Senate would have proceeded with it unless objection was raised. If objection is raised, then it is the duty of the presiding officer, without any motion on the subject——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, and the Chair has so stated, and that is now the pending motion. The Chair, of course, will hear any remarks Senators desire to make. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] was recognized.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not desire to say anything further, but simply to again read Rule XXVII, which is as follows:

> The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

The conference report was made about a week ago. It came here as a privileged report, was received by the Senate, and at the suggestion, I take it, of the chairman of the committee, went over and was printed. Two or three days afterwards it was called up for consideration in the morning hour, and at the expiration of the morning hour it went over because the Senate had an unfinished matter before it, the Nicaragua Canal bill, which displaced the conference report at 2 o'clock day before yesterday, after discussion. Now it is lying upon the table precisely as all other matters are lying there, to be taken up on motion, not as a matter of right—it has passed that stage—and the motion is made after 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of the subject. I desire only to be informed of the opinion of the Chair, and I submit it to the Chair whether, if that motion prevails, it does not permanently dispose of the Nicaraguan Canal bill, unless the Senate afterwards take it up by a vote. I contend that it does.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine that question when it arises. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask what is the motion before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the immigration bill.

Mr. LODGE. My motion was to take up the conference report.

The question of consideration is raised, to be determined, I suppose, without debate.

Mr. GIBSON. I object.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can not do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. VILAS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. Otherwise I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], which I transfer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], with whom I am paired, has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Minnesota has not voted.

Mr. TURPIE. Then I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. BATE. I ask if the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. BATE. Then I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to inquire if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am paired with that Senator, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NELSON. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO. That arrangement has been made with myself and the Senator from Minnesota. So the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] will stand paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which will enable the Senator from Minnesota and myself to vote, as the Senator from Minnesota has already done. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 13; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Immigration, I assented to the report of the original bill. I voted for the bill when it passed the Senate. I am in favor of a reasonable restriction of immigration. The bill, however, has been changed in two particulars by the conference committee, to which I object. Those two particulars are, first, the provision which substantially excludes the wife although the husband is a competent immigrant; and, second, the provision which substitutes the words "resident country" instead of the words "or any other language." In my opinion, the bill ought to be changed in those particulars, and I appeal to my friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to allow the bill to be recommitted to the committee of conference, without further objection on his part, in order that those two changes may be made. If that can be done, I think the bill ought to meet the approval of the Senate; at least, so far as I am concerned, I shall have no further objection to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from New York is a member of the Committee on Immigration, and was chairman of the committee in the last Congress. I ask whether or not he did not assent to the original provision of the bill by which the illiteracy test was applied to males and females alike?

Mr. HILL. I did not sign the report. I told the Senator from Massachusetts he might make the report and I would not dissent from it. That particular point involved was not, however, called to my attention.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did the Senator, after the vote of the Senate was taken by which the provision was made as to the wife, feel that the conference committee ought not to have interfered with that provision?

Mr. HILL. That is my idea.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish to be allowed to say a word, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The subject of restricting immigration commenced by the organization of immigration committees in the two Houses some eight years ago. It was soon found to be a subject of delicacy to secure the passage of laws restricting immigration. There was always the danger that the subject would run into party politics, and the moment any immigration bill was suggested that seemed likely to encounter party opposition, of course that bill was doomed, because no one party could pass an immigration bill.

What has been the result of these eight years of agitation? Simply this: There have been passed two administration bills, the act of March 3, 1891, and the act of March 3, 1893. They have made the administration of the existing exclusions of immigrants more strict and rigid, but have not added to the existing exclusions except in one particular, and that a nominal one. In one of the two laws the word "polygamists" was added, but, with that exception, the existing laws do not exclude any class of immigrants that was not excluded eight years ago when these committees were constituted and the agitation upon this subject began. The reason is that everybody who has investigated the subject, everybody who has taken part in framing legislation on the subject, has felt that it was necessary to have substantial unanimity in order to put any law upon this subject upon the statute book. So that we now, for the first time, approach the question of adding to the existing exclusion, and public sentiment and the efforts of the advocates of legislation have been directed toward an illiteracy test.

Mr. President, I realize now, as I have during the period of which I have spoken, that it is very desirable that there shall be substantial unanimity upon this question. I think, upon a review of the whole subject, in order to secure some approach to that unanimity, the chairman of the committee should assent to the objections of the Senator from New York, who was formerly the chairman of the committee, who has taken part in the deliberations of the committee, and who is entitled to have some regard paid to his judgment upon this question, and allow the report to be recommitted, so that the words "or some other language" may take the place of "the language of the native or resident country," and so that I may be allowed an opportunity, against my serious judgment on this question, to assent to the retention in the clause proposing a new exclusion of the word "wife," so that an illiterate wife may accompany her husband or be sent for by her husband, provided that husband is a qualified immigrant. I join in the request that the Senator from New York makes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the two objections which have been made to the conference report by the Senator from New York are obviously the two objections around which all the serious opposition to the bill, both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, assemble. To myself one of them seems to involve a forced interpretation of the language of the bill, and the other I do not regard as an improvement of the bill—in fact, I am opposed to it; but I have no desire to endanger the legislation by involving it in needless opposition and delays on one or two points which are not absolutely vital. I am still more anxious that this conference report, which I am obliged by my position and by the stage which it has reached in legislation to press, should not be where it is going to block other important measures and add to the confusion now existing in regard to them.

I do not wish to be unreasonable, although I feel very strongly on the subject, and I will consent to the proposition made by the Senator from New York, and will move that the Senate nonconcur in the report of the conference committee and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives.

Mr. GIBSON. Do I understand that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw the conference report involves a request for recommittal?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not understand that at all. I have moved to nonconcur in the conference report and ask for a further conference.

Mr. GIBSON. Then, impliedly, as I understand it, that does involve a recommittal of the conference report to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it does. It involves asking the other House for a new conference. We can not refer it to a conference committee. We can only ask the other House to agree to another conference.

Mr. CHANDLER. In other words, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me, we are on his side just for the moment. We are with him just now.

Mr. GIBSON. I prefer to be the judge as to how far that is the case. I submit an amendment to what I conceive to be the recommittal of the conference report, and that amendment is that the report shall be recommitted with instructions.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can not instruct the conferees, if it is to be a free conference.

Mr. GIBSON. I am ready to suggest what those instructions shall be.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that if we are to have a free conference we can not instruct the conferees. There must be a free conference between the two Houses. If one House undertakes to instruct its conferees, it would not be a free conference. That is the difference between a free conference and a limited one.

Mr. GIBSON. With the most profound respect for the Senator from Ohio, for whom I have the highest regard, I am obliged to differ with the views he has suggested in reference to a free conference. The free conference applies to the first conference between the two Houses, where a free conference is absolutely required. If the conferees should subsequently report to the House that they had not a free conference, or if the conferees should report to the Senate the result of the conference, which results in a point of order being made upon the report, and in the face of the point of order the committee voluntarily withdraws the report and necessarily asks that it be recommitted to the conference whence it came, it is different. Therefore the suggestion as to a free conference applies in the first instance, and has not the power and effect, I respectfully suggest, that the Senator from Ohio has stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is nothing clearer in the ordinary course of legislation. Either House asks for a conference. It is always a free conference, because if the Senate should limit its conferees it would not be a free conference. The House might and would, according to the ordinary course, decline to enter into a conference which is not free and open. It is true that we may instruct our conferees to insist upon certain amendments, but those and all others must be submitted to the House on a free conference. We can not limit the action of the conferees except by expressing our opinion upon a particular subject-matter.

Mr. GIBSON. I will not insist upon the point which I have made in this connection, save to impress upon the Senate the views which I originally had in suggesting it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say also to the Senator from Maryland that I agree with him in many respects, and was not at all prepared, as I stated to the chairman of the committee, to vote for the report of the committee of conference. But if there is to be another conference, it ought to be free and unlimited.

Mr. GIBSON. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, and waive any further suggestions.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, when the bill was first presented to the Senate, I was unable to vote for it. I was opposed to it until the amendment which was originally suggested by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] was agreed to. I then gave it my support, and I regretted very much when the conference report came in with that amendment omitted. It is the amendment which appears on page 9 of the text in the bill before us, in the following language:

> All persons over 16 years of age who can not read and write the language of their native country or some other language; but an admissible immigrant over such age of 16 years may bring in with him or send for his wife or parent or grandparent or minor child or grandchild notwithstanding the inability of such relative to read and write as aforesaid.

If that clause had not been put into the original bill, I am satisfied it could not have passed in the Senate. It was understood when the Senator in charge of the bill accepted this amendment that the committee would stand by it, and it was a disappointment to the friends of the amendment when the conference report came in without it. It is a great hardship, as has already been suggested by the Senator from Maryland, that an immigrant coming into one of our ports with a wife or minor child over the age of 16 years who can not read and write should be obliged to leave his wife or child and come in by himself, and it is a very poor consolation to him to know that he can bring his illiterate grandfather along, although he is obliged to leave his wife and his child to be sent back to their former residence deprived of his protection. Before the bill is recommitted I hope it will be clearly understood that the original clause or one like it is to be put back into the bill. I should have been glad if the course suggested by the Senator from Maryland had been adopted, and the instruction given to the committee to restore the omitted provision to admit the illiterate wife and minor children of an admissible immigrant. But although he has not insisted upon his motion, I trust that when the bill comes back again to the Senate this clause will be restored, and that an immigrant who comes into the country possessed of the proper qualifications will not be obliged to leave part of his family to be shipped back on some returning vessel in case they do not understand how to read and write.

That is all I have to say in reference to the matter. I trust the committee of conference will fully restore this provision. If it does, I shall then be willing to vote for the bill, but I can not vote for it in the shape in which it stands before the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in addition to what the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] has so well stated about its provisions to the Senators who have charge of this measure. I understand perfectly that it is very desirable to have some restriction upon immigration, and to a fair bill I would have no serious objection. The bill as it passed the Senate was not altogether satisfactory to me, but in the main I made no special objection to it. When, however, the conference committee undertook to change, as they did change, for the first time since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, the provisions that had been agreed to by both Houses of Congress, which were material, which went to the very substance of the bill itself, in my judgment they exceeded their authority. When they added to it a new section which had never been considered by either House, they went way beyond the authority of a conference committee.

When objection was raised to the conference report upon these material grounds, and for these reasons alone, so far as I am concerned, the distinguished chairman of the committee, in a very warm and ill-tempered speech, defending his report, made statements that he ought not to have made upon this floor. He said that, with the exception of one or two gentlemen who have considered the question, the opposition to the bill was from a corporation.

Mr. LODGE. I said the outside opposition, and I am glad to repeat it.

Mr. GORMAN. What does the Senator mean by "outside opposition?"

Mr. LODGE. Outside of these Chambers.

Mr. GORMAN. What has that to do with the attitude of any Senator on this floor in the consideration of this question?

Mr. LODGE. I can not conceive that outside pressure would influence any Senator, Mr. President.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts should be the last to make such a speech as was made upon that occasion. He intended to convey the impression to the country that the opposition here is from steamship companies, from one great concern especially, a German line of steamers. If the Senator did not intend to convey that impression, then I do not know what the English language means. Mr. President, if the bill goes back to a conference again, to the same committee or with a chairman who believes that the demand for the insertion of a provision to permit a wife, an ignorant wife of a man, to come in, as was agreed to by both Houses in substance, is backed up only by one great steamship company, I fear the next conference.

What I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts now is that unless the bill as it comes from the conference next time has the provision in it as it passed the other House, applying only to males, or the provision as the bill passed the Senate, admitting the wife as well as the grandparents, the antagonism will be to the end of this session, for there is a great principle involved. It would be a great hardship if the bill passed in that shape, and it will not prevent opposition because a member on the other side of this Chamber talks about the influences of corporations and steamship companies.

If the House of Representatives will agree to the bill substantially as it passed here and as they passed it, then I shall have no serious opposition to it. But I would not be content to send it back to the conferees with such a statement as that made by the chairman of the conference committee, without making this statement at least, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I certainly did not speak in any ill temper whatever when I spoke the other day; and I find on looking at my remarks, which I have not looked at since they were delivered, that, as I supposed, I took the utmost pains to say that no opposition in this Chamber or in the other House of Congress was included in what I had to say about corporate influence. But I did say that corporate influence was exerted against the bill, and I repeat it, and, what is more, I proved it by the telegrams of the great corporation. I have never seen such circulars used before; I have never seen such telegrams used before, and I call it an utterly improper interference on the part of that corporation. They have used all their machinery to arouse feeling outside, and in telegrams and circulars, which I have had printed, they have threatened Congressmen with defeat. I do not mean to say they influenced a human being, but they have made the threats with the intention of influencing them.

Of course, no one in this Chamber would be influenced by a corporation, but that does not make it any better that a corporation comes here with its threatening telegrams and its threatening circulars, telling members of the other House that they will be defeated if they vote in a certain way. I cast no reflection on anybody in either House. I had no right to do so, even if I had desired, and I had no desire to do it.

But I stand by every word that I said about that corporate influence. I produced on this floor the proofs of what that corporation has been trying to do. I published them in the newspapers before I spoke. Then I said that I thought such an exhibition of corporate influence and such attempts on the part of a corporation to influence members of the House or the Senate by threats in that way were something greatly to be deprecated. By that opinion I stand, and I am perfectly willing to leave it to the judgment of our constituents and of the voters of this country whether that sort of corporate influence is desirable or decent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts read the last clause in the telegram, to have telegrams sent to members of Congress?

Mr. LODGE. It says:

> Wire your Congressman, our expense, protesting against proposed exclusion and requesting bill be defeated, informing him that vote in favor means defeat next election.

Mr. CHANDLER. That means necessarily his own defeat at the polls?

Mr. LODGE. Of course. It is signed "Claussenius & Co., North German Lloyd agents in Chicago." All I did was to speak against that corporate influence, and I know that no Senator would agree with me more cordially than the Senator from Maryland in that objection to attempts of corporate influence to threaten Representatives or Senators.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I am delighted to have the Senator from Massachusetts raise his voice against corporate influence to control Congress. I hope he will often in the next year raise his voice in Congress against the power of corporations in attempting to take from the people just rights or to impose upon them greater burdens of taxation or to give to corporations greater power to make money through the national banks and other mediums through which they act. I am glad to see the Senator from Massachusetts fearing the result that is to follow from corporate influence.

The country has just passed through a scene where corporate wealth and corporate power probably controlled. At least, it was the balance of power which selected our rulers in this country for the next four years. I am delighted that the structure which has been built up and used is now beginning to trouble gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. When, however, you invoke it, when you bring it in here simply because there is an attempt to vote down a conference report which excludes the honest wife of an honest immigrant merely because she can not read the Constitution of the United States in some language, and tell us that this foreign corporation is at the door of Congress throttling Senators and Members, and that it is the power which is standing up for these poor women, the wives of these immigrants, the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to say it is begging the question. It has nothing to do with it. The number of immigrants, the women we propose to let in, who would come upon the North German Lloyd steamers would be insignificant. You can not hide behind the corporation this shameless attempt to prevent a man from bringing his wife with him to this country. No picture of corporations, which is distasteful to every man on this side of the Chamber, and would be, I have no doubt, on the other side, so far as the attempt to influence legislation is concerned, can deter us from doing our duty in preventing a committee from violating the rules of this body and the general parliamentary law by excluding from the bill two features which both Houses have agreed to.

The Senator from Massachusetts ought to know that the German Lloyd Company and all the other steamship companies have no special influence on this side of the Chamber. I could quote to the Senator the statements of members of his own party who frankly admit that but for the influence of the German Lloyd Company and the balance of the steamship companies and the corporations and the immigrants of the very class whom it is proposed to exclude, your party would now be in the minority. Of the votes of Americans, the Democratic party stands representing very much more than half, almost two-thirds. It was the Germans scattered from Maine to the Pacific and this class of voters whom you now propose to exclude who gave you your majorities in all the States of the West which you carried, and nearly all of the States in the East. The understanding, growing out of political emergencies, with that large body of American citizens who are intensely American demanded some restriction in immigration, that the mechanics of this country could be more thoroughly protected hereafter. And yet under the provisions of this bill there is not to be excluded a single man of genius or a mechanic of any ability.

There is no relief to the industrial people of this country even under the bill as it stands, except for the laborers who go into the cotton fields in the South and in the trenches to work on railroads and canals, the most subordinate positions in the country. There is no relief in this bill, as it passed the Senate or the other House or as it is proposed to be amended by the committee, which amounts to anything. A blacksmith, or a mason, or a machinist, or a man in nearly any of the other trades can read and write. It is relief only to that class who, as I say, are downtrodden, who have not had the opportunity and never will have to learn anything on the other side, and who would come here to perform the most menial service. But in enabling them to come in, or whoever does come in, what we contend for and what I trust the committee of conference will take note of when they come to consider the matter again, is that the provision which excludes women, which makes war upon an honest but unfortunately an ignorant wife, can not pass through the Senate at this session. It ought not to pass it at any time. The conference committee must take notice that they have no right to frame a bill by adding a section that was never considered by either House of Congress.

The Senator from Massachusetts has had the matter long under consideration. The bill has been long under consideration in both Houses of Congress. If it was not a perfect bill, one which could be executed, it is the fault of both Houses. It is a misfortune, possibly. But the committee of conference had no right to add to it another section that had never been submitted here for discussion, that we had not been permitted to look at, which, coming under the rule as it does as to conference committees, could not be amended, for there is no vote but one to concur in the report or to send it back. The report can not be amended. It must be voted on as a whole, and hence the strict rule which prohibits you from putting new matter in a bill in conference or changing materially the matters that have been considered by both Houses and a determination reached.

Now, that is all I desire to say, reserving careful consideration of the report when it comes back hereafter.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Maryland before he takes his seat, as he is a good parliamentarian, whether a vote to recommit the bill to the conference committee does not carry with it impliedly an instruction to insist upon the Senate amendment? If it does not, that ought to be incorporated in the language of the resolution for recommittal.

Mr. GORMAN. Of course, very much depends upon the conferees. It is very seldom that a case ever arises in the Senate when the conferees do not desire to carry out the will of the body, and I have never known a contested case where the conferees were not selected with a view to carrying out the will of the Senate. They ought to adhere to it, but not to the extent of preventing an agreement. Some gentleman who is favorable to the position of the House he is to represent ought to be on the conference committee, as a matter of course. I do not believe that it goes to the extent——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order, if the Senator from Maryland will pardon me. What is the pending question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to nonconcur in the report of the committee of conference and ask for a further conference,

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maryland has spoken of it always as a motion to recommit, which, I understand, is not the pending motion. That motion would not have been in order.

Mr. GRAY. It is practically that.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts says it is not a motion to recommit. Practically it is that. It means that. The bill goes back to the same conferees.

Mr. FRYE. The proper motion would be that the Senate nonconcur in the report of the committee, insist upon its amendments, and ask for a further conference.

Mr. HOAR. That motion has been made.

Mr. LODGE. That is the precise motion which I made.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made that motion.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the pending motion, upon which the Senator from Maryland addressed the Chair.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, there are two extraordinary things in the speech of the Senator from Maryland. There is no need, I will say to the Senator from Delaware, of any instructions to this conference committee. They have been instructed by the Senator from Maryland, who has notified the Senate and the country that if the bill comes back from the conference and does not suit him, every method is to be resorted to to prevent its passage.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. We understand what that means. That means that this conference——

Mr. GORMAN. I want to stop the Senator right there to say that I made no such statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. The language of the Senator will be read in the RECORD.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; it can be read at any time.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator's statement was something like this, that all means would be resorted to to prevent the passage of the bill, which I understood to mean then, and I understand it now to mean, that filibustering methods will be resorted to to defeat the conference report if it does not come back here to suit the Senator from Maryland. If he did not mean that, of course he will disclaim that meaning; but I certainly so understood it. I say that was an extraordinary speech for the Senator from Maryland to make upon a measure of this kind, the conferees of which have been endeavoring to so arrange it, to so amend it, as to make it acceptable to the great bulk of Senators upon this floor and to the great mass of the members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, there is another extraordinary thing in the speech of the Senator from Maryland. He has made the first political speech that has ever been made in the Senate in the discussion of the immigration question. So far as I know, there has not been an attempt in all these years to introduce party politics into the subject. I supposed that the Senator from Maryland was as desirous, as I supposed the distinguished Senator from New York, a member of the Committee on Immigration, former chairman of the Committee on Immigration, was desirous, of framing a bill which, in accordance with the platforms of the two parties, the Senator's party and my party, should limit and restrict the growing evil of injurious immigration. No; the Senator is not content with that, and he has gone on here and has undertaken to introduce a political discussion at this time, a discussion which will be entirely fit when a tariff bill comes to be considered, or when any question that ought to be brought into politics or can by human device be brought into politics is under discussion in this Chamber. The Senator is the first to try to take advantage of the pendency of a bill of this kind, which the friends of the measure and the friends of the country are trying to put into shape, if they possibly can, so as to obviate all objections and secure unanimity in its passage.

The Senator from Maryland undertakes to drag party politics into the discussion of the subject. I regret that the Senator has done that. I regret that the falling fortunes of the Senator's party have required him, in his opinion, to seek to take a political advantage of the pendency of a beneficent bill of this kind, which has nothing partisan in it, which has had everything eliminated from it which by any possibility could give either party an advantage or have a party argument made to rest upon it.

The Senator has taken advantage of the pendency of this bill to renew political discussions. Mr. President, I deprecate it. I shall be glad to discuss with the Senator, when the next report comes in, the question whether the conference committee has exceeded its authority. I trust when that report is made the Senators on both sides of the Chamber will refrain from an attempt to introduce political questions in connection with immigration, because if they are introduced all attempts to restrict the undesirable immigration and to protect the laborers of this country will come to naught.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I voted for this bill as it passed the Senate, and I hope it may be put in such form in conference as to merit my vote again. I do not now wish to present any instructions to the committee of conference, nor do I rise to hinder or delay action; but I do desire to call attention to one peculiarity of the bill as presented by the conferees, which seems to me very seriously objectionable.

It will be observed that section 3 of the bill as it passed the House and section 4 of the bill as adopted by the conference committee are practically identical sections. Section 3 was stricken out by the Senate from the House bill, and is embodied neither in principle nor in phraseology in any form in the Senate bill. That section provides, if agreed to—

That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any male alien who has not in good faith made his declaration before the proper court of his intention to become a citizen of the United States to be employed on any public works of the United States, or to come regularly or habitually into the United States by land or water for the purpose of engaging in any mechanical trade or manual labor, for wages or salary, returning from time to time to a foreign country.

This provision of the bill was manifestly intended to apply in practice to citizens of the Dominion of Canada. It must be borne in mind that the entire population of Canada does not exceed 5,000,000 souls. The population of the United States equals about 70,000,000 to-day. There are fifty citizens of the United States engaged in useful and lucrative business occupations in the Dominion of Canada to one Canadian finding employment within the limits of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Montana let me ask him a question on that point?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator to say, then, that there is fifty times the opportunity in Canada for employment that there is in the United States?

Mr. CARTER. The proportion of population being considered, I say that there are fifty citizens out of our 70,000,000 employed in Canada where there is one citizen out of the 5,000,000 Canadians employed on this side of the line.

Mr. LODGE. There is more of opportunity to get employment in Canada than there is here?

Mr. CARTER. There is a broader country undeveloped in Canada than there is in the United States, and we have over 70,000,000 as against their 5,000,000. We have an aggressive and progressive people in invading an undeveloped country all over this continent; we have an irrepressible population. West of the main range of the Rocky Mountains, in the Kootenai country and all through that vast, magnificent mining region, extending thence to the Pacific Ocean, there must be to-day of the citizens of Montana alone fully 10,000 miners engaged in useful work, making good wages in that country. Those people are treated with the same consideration which is accorded a resident of Canada or a citizen or subject of Great Britain. They are required to take out a miner's license, for which they pay the usual fee, and no discrimination in that behalf is made against a citizen of the United States. On the other hand, there are a few individuals on the Eastern coast who come down from Canada every year to chop wood in winter and to pick hops, possibly, in the summer season. If we incorporate this proposed section in the law, we will constrain the Dominion of Canada or the local parliament of British Columbia to initiate retaliatory legislation. We invite it; we put them upon their manhood to enact it as an ordinary vindication of common self-respect. I do not wish any measure to be incorporated in this or any other law which will justify the Dominion of Canada in resorting to drastic measures to drive the laborers of the State I have the honor in part to represent out of the lucrative employment they find at the present time in British Columbia.

I think this part of the proposed act should be stricken out in conference. I do not wish to indulge in any threat or menace if such action should not obtain, but I express the sincere hope that the conference committee will take into consideration the injurious effects that would follow the retention of this particular feature of the measure as it now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. LODGE, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, at the time when the Senate adjourned last night I had considered the two reasons which were given by the Committee on Foreign Relations to sustain their opinion that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is no longer of obligation upon the United States.

A third reason was suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the distinguished chairman of the select committee, to the effect, as I understand it, that because this country independently and Great Britain independently had made treaties with Nicaragua since the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was ratified, therefore the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was no longer obligatory upon us.

It will be recognized at once that any treaty which the United States could have made independently with Nicaragua could in no manner discharge the obligation which the United States had assumed and contracted to observe by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with England. If, then, there is any force whatever in the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, it must find that force in the terms of a treaty made by England with Nicaragua to which we could rightfully take exception. If any such treaty as would operate to discharge the United States from her obligation to Great Britain has been made by England with Nicaragua, I should like to have it pointed out and the terms of it submitted, so that we could form a judgment upon it with due consideration. But no such treaty is brought before us, and never in any other report or argument which I have been able to find, in which this subject has been in anywise considered, has any such point been taken against the validity and binding obligation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty upon us.

The language used in the report made to this Congress by the select committee I will read, in order that it may appear from those words that evidently no such contention can be successfully maintained. Indeed, I would not have supposed that it would have been urged from what the report says, or that it was intended to mean that.

The question as to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—

I read from page 12 of the report made at the first session of the present Congress, Senate Report No. 1109—in its relation to this canal, whether it exists or is liable to revocation or denunciation for any cause, can not prevent either of the treaty powers from the enjoyment of rights acquired from Nicaragua by later treaties, both Governments having affirmed by unequivocal acts in obtaining such rights that each had the separate right to secure them by treaty with Nicaragua.

An inquiry into the questions, if there are any, as to the rights of the two Governments under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is entirely apart from the rights of each country under their respective treaties with Nicaragua, which were concluded at a later period.

Mr. President, if the theory of invalidity is to be based upon the assertion that because the United States have made a separate treaty with Nicaragua, then the proposition would be simply that we could discharge our obligation to Great Britain under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by making a treaty with some other country in violation of it. If there be anything which Great Britain has done to discharge our obligation to that country under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, then that action of that Government should be presented to us. Though we might by some treaty with another power break our treaty with Great Britain, we could not release ourselves from its obligation. The point is so obvious that it hardly needs discussion.

But, sir, I suppose the transaction to which the Senator from Alabama alludes was one which took place prior to the time when the President of the United States, Mr. Buchanan, by his message of December, 1860, advised the Congress that the complaints which had been urged against Great Britain had been removed by her action. So that, so far as that is concerned, there is and can be nothing in the point that we could now dismiss ourselves from the undertakings into which we had entered because of the action of Great Britain then.

But, sir, I wish to call attention to one other fact which is in complete denial, in utter extinction, of any right on our part to say that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is either voidable or has become avoided altogether. We have, long since the time when these supposed acts of infringement took place, insisted upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in communication with Great Britain, and claimed its binding obligation upon that country. I will point to but two or three dispatches which fix our acknowledgment of the validity of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty beyond all reasonable doubt or contradiction. I call attention, first, to the dispatch of our Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, to our minister to England, General Schenck, under date of the 26th of April, 1873, which will be found in the document called "Correspondence in relation to the proposed interoceanic canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Monroe doctrine." The document is not numbered except as it is declared to be a "Reprint of Senate Executive Documents No. 112, Forty-sixth Congress, second session; No. 194, Forty-seventh Congress, first session; and No. 26, Forty-eighth Congress, first session."

Mr. GRAY. When was it reprinted?

Mr. VILAS. It was reprinted in 1885. That dispatch, of which I will only read the beginning and conclusion, directed our minister to England as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 26, 1873.

SIR: You are aware that a main object of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, so called, of the 19th of April, 1850, was to provide against obstruction by either party to a ship canal to the Pacific through Nicaragua. A work of that kind was then deemed specially necessary and desirable for us, as California had recently been acquired, the only practicable way to which was across the Isthmus of Panama or around Cape Horn. For some time previously to date of that instrument, and especially during the considerable period when the United States were without a diplomatic representative in Central America, it seemed to be the policy of the British Government to avail itself of what was called its protectorate of the King of Mosquitos to wrest from Nicaragua that part of its territory claimed on behalf of that Indian chief, including, of course, the mouths of the San Juan River, by the way of which it was supposed the proposed ship canal must pass. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty effectually checked this pretension. It also, in terms, forbade either party to occupy or fortify in any part of Central America. The British Government, probably actuated by an apprehension that this stipulation might be construed against their claims at Balize, Honduras, instructed Sir H. L. Bulwer to make the declaration of 29th of June, 1850, when the ratifications were to be exchanged, to the effect that they did not understand the engagements of the convention to apply to Balize and its dependencies. In a note to Sir Henry of the 4th of July, 1850, Mr. Clayton acknowledged that it was not the purpose of the convention to apply to Balize and its dependencies.

Then follows other discussion of that treaty and of certain points of objection to supposed recent action of Great Britain, which I shall not weary the Senate by reading, but I note the concluding part. Speaking of the representations of a minister of Guatemala here, Mr. Dardon, Mr. Fish directs the minister to England, first, to ascertain the correctness of the representations of Mr. Dardon as to the cause of the discontinuance of the demarcation of the boundary complained of, and then adds this instruction:

If the statement of that gentleman should prove to be correct, you will then formally remonstrate against any trespass by British subjects, with the connivance of their Government, upon the territory of Guatemala as an infringement of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which will be very unacceptable in this country.

I am, etc., HAMILTON FISH.

But we have a much more recent acknowledgment of the validity of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. There have been several in the course of our correspondence. On the 19th of November, 1881, Mr. Blaine, being then our Secretary of State, addressed Mr. Lowell, our minister to England, in a dispatch which will be found as No. 338 of the communications with Great Britain in the document called Foreign Relations, volume 1, of 1881 and 1882. In that dispatch Mr. Blaine called attention to the increase of our interests in that region as rendering some change necessary in the terms of our treaty with Great Britain, called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He says in the early part:

The respect due to Her Majesty's Government demands that the objections to the perpetuity of the convention of 1850, as it now exists, should be stated with directness and with entire frankness; and among the most salient and palpable of these is the fact that the operation of the treaty practically concedes to Great Britain the control of whatever canal may be constructed.

Then he proceeds to further discussion, which I do not wish to take up time——

Mr. HOAR. When was that?

Mr. VILAS. That was November 19, 1881.

Now let me turn to what Mr. Blaine desired with reference to this treaty in a later part of the same dispatch:

It is earnestly hoped by the President that the considerations now presented will have due weight and influence with Her Majesty's Government, and that the modifications of the treaty desired by the United States will be conceded in the same friendly spirit in which they are asked.

The following is a summary of the changes necessary to meet the views of this Government:

First. Every part of the treaty which forbids the United States fortifying the canal and holding the political control of it in conjunction with the country in which it is located to be canceled.

Second. Every part of the treaty in which Great Britain and the United States agree to make no acquisition of territory in Central America to remain in full force.

I forbear to read the argument added to that second proposition.

Third. The United States will not object to maintaining the clause looking to the establishment of a free port at each end of whatever canal may be constructed, if England desires it to be retained.

Fourth. The clause in which the two Governments agree to make treaty stipulations for a joint protectorate of whatever railway or canal might be constructed at Tehuantepec or Panama has never been perfected. No treaty stipulations for the proposed end have been suggested by either party, although citizens of the United States long since constructed a railway at Panama and are now engaged in the same work at Tehuantepec. It is a fair presumption, in the judgment of the President, that this provision should be regarded as obsolete by the nonaction and common consent of the two Governments.

Fifth—

And the most important of all to our present discussion—

Fifth. The clause defining the distance from either end of the canal where in time of war captures might be made by either belligerent on the high seas, was left incomplete and the distance was never determined. In the judgment of the President, speaking in the interest of peaceful commerce, this distance should be made as liberal as possible, and might, with advantage, as a question relating to the high seas and common to all nations, be a matter of stipulation between the great powers of the world.

In the concluding paragraph, after expressing the points of change that were desired, the minister was instructed to acquaint Lord Granville with the purpose of the United States, etc., in his own way.

Sir, just think of that dispatch, were we to answer Great Britain, if she insisted upon the obligation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that it was in 1853 practically abrogated, or that it had become obsolete, or that anything she has done has operated to discharge the United States from the obligations assumed by it! Is it not so obvious that no Senator in this Senate could pretend such a thing for a moment, after such insistence upon that treaty long posterior to the events spoken of as affecting its obligation, and when our minister to England was instructed by this Government to insist upon its terms to restrain and prevent some action of England, and when again, eight years later, our minister was instructed to lay before England a proposition for some modification of it? Is it possible that any Senator here could pretend for a moment that were our dealings with a great power, or with any state, whether great or small, of such a nature as that the United States could be less than dishonored if we did not recognize our obligation?

In another dispatch on the 29th of November from the Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, to our minister, Mr. Lowell, in which he referred to the former and made some further discussion in regard to it, he speaks thus of this treaty of which we have been talking as if it were of no account as concerns this bill:

In perusing—

Says Mr. Blaine—

the voluminous correspondence, unprinted as well as that printed and submitted at the time to Congress and to Parliament, I am more than ever struck by the elastic character of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the admirable purpose it has served as an ultimate recourse on the part of either Government to check apprehended designs in Central America on the part of the other, although all the while it was frankly admitted on both sides that the engagements of the treaty were misunderstandingly entered into, imperfectly comprehended, contradictorily interpreted, and mutually vexatious. I am, as I must confess, strengthened in this impression by the circumstance that in his response to my dispatch of the 24th of June last, Earl Granville takes the ground that the position of Great Britain and the United States toward the projected Panama Canal is determined by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

I do not need to read more to illustrate the point.

Mr. President, let us pause a moment to sum up the evidences in respect to the declared policy of the United States upon the subject of this canal. I showed upon yesterday that from the first moment when it became a matter of official discussion in our Department of State the statesmanlike, wise, and farseeing policy of a complete neutralization of that canal was foreshadowed by Mr. Clay. From that time on, by resolution adopted in the Senate, by report of committee in the House, by message of the President of the United States transmitting the treaty of Granada, which was based upon a similar policy, and promptly ratified, and finally by the negotiation and ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, every line of official action by executive and legislative departments of the Government had declared our policy to be one of neutralization in war as in peace of that canal.

Sir, let us go a step further. I wish to consider next whether this policy is not so obviously the right policy that if now, for the first time, we were to consider what should be adopted to guide our national action, we should not be driven by force of reason to the same conclusion which has found continuing expression in all our public action.

Let us see, sir, what is this theory that by a taking phrase has been laid down to the people of America for our true national line of action, as "an American canal under American control." What is meant by "American control?" Does it mean control of that canal exclusively by the United States, or in such conjunction with the state upon whose territory it shall be built as that practically the dominance of the United States is complete and the exclusiveness as much hers as if she owned the territory? If so, sir, what is the significance of that control? Is it that we shall say whether vessels of other countries shall pass through the canal between the two oceans at our pleasure? That question has two branches. First, as it relates to the ships of commerce in time of peace or of war—not the ships of belligerents—and, second, as it relates to ships of war either in time of peace or in time of war.

Suppose the first, and that we were to enact this bill by which the United States Government incorporates itself, and in a corporate capacity goes forth under this concession from the State of Nicaragua to build that canal, and then as owner or proprietary, with the assent of Nicaragua, denies to the vessels of commerce of other nations of the world the right to pass through on payment of the fixed tolls. Mr. President, think of the posture in which that would place the canal toward England and Germany and France, whose commercial vessels seek to use it in order to escape the long and stormy passage around Cape Horn. They would deal with Nicaragua. The United States would not be there as a sovereign, but as a corporation. Nicaragua is the sovereign upon whose territory this junction of the oceans will have been built. England would say to Nicaragua: "The United States enjoy the right to pass their ships at will through that canal on payment of tolls. Are we to exist with you under the least-favored-nation arrangement?" Would not England, Germany, France, all the naval powers of the world, say to Nicaragua at once: "You will hold no exclusive control over the waters of that strait which has been moved northward from the Straits of Magellan;" and their representation would be so potential, so absolutely irresistible, that Nicaragua would in an instant recognize the obligation to treat those countries as she treats the United States.

More than that, Mr. President, this very concession, under which it is suggested to us that we should go there to build a canal as a corporation, provides for the very thing, as I read to the Senate on yesterday, and by the terms of that concession it would be necessary for this poor Government of ours, in its corporate capacity, to admit the vessels of other nations to pass on payment of the tolls.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I suggest that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURSTON in the chair). The Senator from Indiana raises the question as to the presence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. BATE. The name of my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] has been frequently called during the various roll calls which have been had. I wish to state that my colleague is sick and unable to attend the sessions of the Senate. I desire to have that fact recorded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, suppose another theory of our control of vessels of commerce. Is it meant that the United States can fix different rates of toll for the vessels of different nations? How long, think you, sir, would England, Germany, France, the nations of the earth who send their ships abroad, permit Nicaragua to allow her corporation to charge one toll for the passage of an English, German, French, or other ship through that canal and a lesser toll for the passage of a ship of the United States? How long, think you, would they tolerate the Republic of Nicaragua in discrimination against their commerce on the high seas in order to throw an advantage to the United States? How long, if either we undertook to exclude—we in our corporate capacity, I mean—the vessels of other nations or to impose discriminating tolls upon them, would it be before the guns of England resounded on the coast of Central America? We saw but a little while ago how quick she was to seize upon a port there for indemnity because merely some injury had been done to one of her citizens by officials of that State. And if those powers were to unite in such demand upon Nicaragua, is it then that the United States would show herself in her sovereign capacity and come out of the skin of the corporation to say, "Lo, here is the ally of Nicaragua"? How should this Government then appear? Not after the old fable of the ass braying in the lion's skin, nor perhaps as the lion roaring in the ass's skin, but to the eye of the world it would probably seem the ass was there in his own proper person and apparel. It is obvious at once that to establish that canal in this manner or to assert that control over it would be to invite war with the nations of the earth. Our country would tolerate no such injury. If any nation undertook so to deal with the United States in respect to such a waterway as that, it would be the signal of war unless the pretension were withdrawn.

Let us think of it for another moment, to put it on the lower plane. How would the United States derive these golden showers of dividends if it were to exclude the vessels of commerce of other nations from passing through the canal? The theory of the distinguished chairman of the select committee is that great gains can be derived by the corporation which shall build the canal from the tonnage dues it will levy upon the vessels of other countries. No, sir; if we refuse to them the right to pass; not if we put discriminating duties upon them, for they would not pass. It could only be made useful if it were perfectly certain that whenever any vessel of commerce put into Grey Town or Brito its right of passage through the canal was assuredly foreknown, because its voyage must have been directed with reference to that expectation. It is hardly open to question then for an instant. I do not believe that any man upon this floor can argue that the United States as a corporation, Nicaragua as a sovereign, or Nicaragua and the United States in alliance could maintain exclusiveness in that canal.

But let us pass to the other branch. How would it be in case of war? Could Nicaragua or the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua undertake to maintain the canal on a different footing from that which has been adopted by the civilized nations of the earth with others? What is demanded in respect to such a water with reference to a state of war? That question has been presented to Europe. It has been presented to the United States with reference to this very canal, and, as I showed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, there stands now our explicit agreement obliging us to permit England to send her vessels of war through the canal at her will, even though we were her antagonist, and the accompanying and supplementary engagement that we will endeavor with her to extend a similar arrangement to the other powers of Europe. Unless that were done in every war that might occur, in which the vessels of either belligerent were excluded from the canal, the fact would constitute at once a provocation to destroy it. If the vessels of one belligerent should enjoy it while the vessels of another were excluded, at once the canal becomes the scene of hostile conflict. All that has been fully considered by the statesmen of Europe in a similar case—the Suez Canal. They have had these questions before them and they have met them in that broad, strong, understanding way in which the great men of the world look upon questions of this kind.

I shall show the story in a very clear and direct narration given in an interesting article a year or two ago by Mr. Woolsey. I read from the Yale Review of November, 1895, an account of the way in which the Suez Canal was built, and how the great powers of Europe have dealt with its use:

The Suez Canal was dug by a French company under a concession from the Khedive of 1856, confirmed by the Sultan, his suzerain. Article XIV of this concession embodied a formal declaration that the canal should be always open as a neutral passageway to merchant ships of every nationality. But this was clearly insufficient, for Egypt, even with the possible backing of Turkey, was too weak to make the declaration good. A much stronger guaranty was needed for its effectiveness. Moreover, nothing prevented Turkey, in case of war, from blocking the canal, or even breaking it. The world's commerce was not guaranteed against the guarantor. For the security of this commerce a European concert was needed. What shape should this take?

Twenty years before a spade was struck into the sands of Suez, Prince Metternich had answered this question. In 1838 Mohammed Ali had asked his opinion in regard to a Suez Canal project, and received this reply: That if he wished to secure the accomplishment of his plan he should look to a neutralization of the canal by a European treaty. On this line the solution of the problem has been worked out, not without difficulties. The first step was taken in 1873. At Constantinople, in December of that year, was signed an agreement that the Suez Canal should be open to transports and ships of war of all signatories alike. Accepted by Turkey and the canal company, this act was acceded to by nearly all the European powers, including Russia. Thus the principle of European control was initiated.

In 1877 came the war between Russia and Turkey. It was of the greatest importance to commerce that the canal should be free from its operations. To this end Great Britain issued a declaration that any attempt to blockade the canal or its approaches would be regarded as a menace to India and an injury to the commerce of the world, which would compel the abandonment of British neutrality. This threat drew from Prince Gortschakoff the announcement that Russia desired neither to interrupt nor threaten the canal's navigation; but, on the contrary, considered it an international enterprise affecting the world's commerce, which must remain free from all attack.

The Arabi outbreak in 1882 threatened the security of the canal still more seriously, and proved even more forcibly the insufficiency of a merely Egyptian guaranty—the necessity of European control. France timidly declined the responsibilities of joint occupation, and thereby lost her share in the dual control. Great Britain shelled the insurgents out of Alexandria, occupied the canal as a base, and defeated Arabi's forces, acting throughout at the request of the Khedive. Her subsequent occupation of Egypt, without the urgent solicitation of the Khedive, is another matter having a bearing upon the protection of the canal, but not upon its international status. It was induced rather by the English ownership of Egyptian bonds and by the threatening rise of a fanatical invader out of the deserts. By those who are always suspicious of England's good faith, her renunciation of sole control of the canal while occupying Egypt is a fact to be pondered.

Nor did the purchase of canal shares by the British Government give it additional political rights.

Let me remark that the ownership of all the shares of the Maritime Canal Company would give the United States no political rights.

Were the Emperor of Germany to own a thousand square miles of land in Texas, it would none the less be subject solely to the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the State and the nation. So in the Suez Canal the jurisdiction of the sovereign was not qualified by English financial control. The relations of state and corporation were laid down by the concession—under which the English Government enjoyed rights in common with other shareholders. And this would be true in our own case were the United States to lend its credit to a Nicaragua canal. Rights in the line of management would be gained thereby, but the political status would not be affected.

As they would be here—

In the case of Suez this status was not yet definitely and satisfactorily determined. By force of circumstances Great Britain has assumed, single handed, responsibilities which properly belonged to Europe and which she desired Europe to assume. An invitation to the powers with this end in view in 1883 remained unaccepted for two years. Then, in 1885, a commission representing ten States met in Paris to draw up for consideration an international act, which should offer a definite form of control capable of guaranteeing at all times and for all powers the free use of the Suez Canal.

This was the basis upon which was built up the convention of Constantinople of 1887. Its conditions are briefly these:

The Suez Canal shall forever be free and open, in time of war as well as in times of peace, to the vessels, whether merchantmen or men-of-war, of all nations.

Neither it nor its approaches to the distance of 3 marine miles shall ever be blockaded.

The canal itself, the various works connected with it, and the Sweetwater Canal, which furnishes its fresh water supply, shall ever be inviolable.

No act of war shall take place upon it, though belligerent ships may be using it, and a twenty-four hour's interval shall elapse between the departure of hostile ships from either terminal.

No troops or material of war shall be landed along it, and no ships of a belligerent shall be stationed in its ports, but neutral states may maintain not to exceed two ships of war each for its protection.

When, in the opinion of the representatives of the powers in Egypt, the security of the canal is threatened, the Government of the Khedive shall first be called upon for its protection. Failing this, the Porte shall have the duty of treaty execution laid upon it, and if Turkey should prove unequal to the task the signatory powers shall act in concert with her.

No permanent fortifications are permitted.

No contracting power shall enjoy special territorial or commercial advantages in it.

The sovereignty shall reside, as before, in Turkey.

The accession of as many powers as possible shall be secured to this treaty.

These stipulations have been agreed to by Austria, France, Great Britain, Germany, Holland, Italy, Spain, and possibly others. Russia and Turkey held aloof, but in 1888 Turkey yielded to pressure and acceded. The present status of the Suez Canal, therefore, is that of neutrality guaranteed and protected by the leading powers of Europe with the exception of Russia.

That is what statesmanship has provided for the first of the two great waterways which Mr. Wheaton foresaw in his dispatch of 1845 were to be built between the equator and 40° north latitude, so as to enable a passage round the world of ships of commerce or of war; and that policy which we have agreed to execute with Great Britain, and which the countries of Europe have established with reference to the Suez Canal, is inevitably to become the governing policy of an isthmian canal, if ever one shall be constructed, wherever it may be, between the waters of the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans. There must be neutralization complete, and in addition to it sufficient zones of adjacent ocean water on the Pacific side and on the Gulf side to guarantee and insure the impossibility that a hostile naval conflict could occur at any point where it might put in jeopardy the continuance of the canal.

Mr. LINDSAY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky having suggested the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. VILAS. If I am right in the views which I have just presented, and to which but for the time I have engaged the attention of the Senate I should be glad to urge other reasons to impress them more firmly, then it follows that the isthmian canal between the waters which bound our continent must be like the canal which leads from the Mediterranean to the seas of India, an open, free canal, which all the powers of the earth will join to give the same right of passage through that nature has given to the straits of Magellan or of Gibraltar. With that conclusion there dissipated at once all this froth and spume gathered about the idea of an American canal under American control, words which appeal to a petty, seeming selfishness of patriotism, but can bear no scrutiny when subjected to the just view of reason, of science, of the enlightenment that guides and rules the progress of humanity.

Sir, canals are instruments of commerce, and the project of this canal is to me most alluring and delightful, because it is another harbinger of peace. Commerce can not exist with war. It is a constant antagonist of war. It must have law, justice, fairness, and all the guaranties which advance humanity in order to its prosperity. Never has Christianity had an ally such as commerce has been; and commerce is now a necessity to the life of man on the globe. We can not dispense with it; we can not cripple it. The breath of a rumor of war is like a lightning blast upon the great avenues of trade and business. Let but the dread story sound of a mere threat of war, and suffering follows through the thousand ramifications of business down to the homes and hearthstones of the meekest and the poorest of the land.

The distinguished and honorable Senator who is in charge of the pending bill has intimated to us that there is something wrapped up in it which is antagonistic to the treaty of arbitration.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to make a suggestion to the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. VILAS. With great pleasure.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator says that commerce and war are inconsistent. It would seem to be so, but I hold in my hand a book entitled The Expansion of England, by J. R. Seeley, a professor of modern history at Cambridge, in which he says:

It seems to me to be the principal characteristic of this phase of England that she is at once commercial and warlike. A commonplace is current about the natural connection between commerce and peace.

But he goes on to say that this is the law:

The law, namely, of the intimate interdependence of war and trade, so that throughout that period—

A century or so—trade leads naturally to war and war fosters trade.

* * * * * * *

England, indeed, grew ever more warlike at that time as she grew more commercial.

She made war for the sake of getting a chance to sell things. She wants a treaty of peace now.

Mr. VILAS. I shall indulge the Senator from Connecticut in reading that observation from Professor Seeley, and spend no time in regard to it.

You propose war to England with a power fit to cope with her and see whether commerce is antagonistic to war.

Mr. HAWLEY. But, begging pardon, most of her wars are with small people, and generally end by her taking possession.

Mr. VILAS. Precisely. She does not have war. The wars that the Senator talks about are such as would be the effort of a mouse under the paw of a lion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know that she fights weak people frequently, but she has had more than forty wars in less than fifty years, mostly, however, with weak people.

Mr. VILAS. I do not desire to make any observations here that might carry an injurious import to another country, but, sir, think you that the commercial interests of England will tolerate a war with a power like the United States unless the degradation of avoiding it was such as of itself to be more perilous to her trade? The man who argues in this day and generation that war is the acolyte of commerce has but a pitiful and insignificant conception of the great agencies which are carrying forward the evolution of man upon this globe. No, sir; so far from the distinguished Senator from Alabama being justified in the intimation that there can be anything hostile in that great treaty of peace to the interests of the project of an isthmian canal there could be nothing that would be more advantageous to it, nothing more conducive to its construction or to its effecting the great purposes for which it should be created.

We ought to rejoice in the promise which such an engagement, putting a discontinuance to war on earth, gives to such projects as this for the enlargement of the great instruments of commerce and peace. And it is a strange misconception, in my poor judgment, sir, that the United States can, in any aspect of consideration, find their interests, their prosperity, the promotion of the happiness of their people in any other course than that which shall keep our country where for a century she has been—the noble leader in the great movement of liberty and enlightenment and human advancement traveling around the globe.

Now, sir, let me pause to review for a moment the effect of the arguments which I have been making.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not raise that point now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BACON. I will state that I am perfectly willing to remain here as long as a quorum is present; but I do not think half of the body ought to be required to remain here when the rest are away.

Mr. VILAS. I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I will withdraw the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia can not withdraw it. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the roll must be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Roach,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. VILAS. For what purpose?

Mr. HILL. I rose to suggest an executive session.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from New York give me about ten minutes before submitting such a motion?

Mr. HILL. Very well; I will not make the motion now.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I think I have demonstrated by the argument submitted, first, that the United States is under binding, unescapable obligation of good faith to Great Britain to provide for a guaranty with her of neutrality in war and peace, to vessels of war as well as of peace at all times, if this canal should be constructed. Further, I have shown that without that guaranty we should be simply one step short of what we must seek for the canal in any case; that it must be a neutral water, a part of the oceans which it will connect, with all the rights and privileges of an ocean strait, and with the guaranty of the great powers of the earth for the preservation of peace there forever and, as such, to be welcomed, as the world welcomes the Suez Canal, as a spot on earth where by common consent of man war can no more be waged, whatever the fury of hostile nations.

If that be so, then there is a complete demolition of the supposed answer, and the only plausible answer ever offered, to the demand that they should build this canal whose commercial interests are to receive the benefits of it. This canal ought to have for its sponsors and controllers, and as well for its constructors, the great nations of the earth whose commerce shall pass through it.

Now, sir, a word or two with reference to what the duty of the United States is in view of these considerations.

First, let me say that I acknowledge without hesitancy the desirability of that canal to the human race. I acknowledge its desirability to the United States, albeit our share of expectation from it must be so much less than that of other nations of the world, as our commerce is at present, at least, existing.

I shall answer now the suggestion frequently made by the distinguished chairman of the select committee to the objectors to this particular scheme, "What will you do for this canal?" Sir, I conceive the United States have a high duty in reference to it. I acknowledge that duty. It is not, sir, to shoulder upon our citizens all the cost, at all the risk, of the canal, to take all the chances of war and trouble that may flow from it, but it is that same duty which nature seems to have assigned to the United States among the kingdoms of the earth. It is the duty of leadership.

It belongs to us, sir, to take the flag in our hands, but as a messenger of peace, good will, commercial prosperity, and increased welfare. As such a leader in this great enterprise we have some things to consider. First, it is due to the other nations of the earth—a debt of mutual intercourse which was recognized in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—that we do not declare absolutely all the law and methods that shall govern this project, but proffer to them the open hand of fair conference, invite their reasonable suggestions, and unite with them in reasonable provision for its construction and maintenance. And, sir, as a leader among the nations of the earth, I conceive that it belongs to us to do what I have proposed in the amendment offered as a substitute for the bill, not to go on with a half-understood, perilous, uncertain project which every business man must condemn when asked to engage in it, but to begin as any wise man begins when he intends to invite capital to contribute effort to a great scheme; to begin by acquiring the accurate and sufficient information which will enable an intelligent determination as to the probabilities of the proposed project and the availability of the plan upon which it should be executed.

We have seen by the report of the commission which we sent there to examine this scheme of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua that, from one end to the other of it, it is utterly untrustworthy. That board of intelligent, patriotic engineers has declared that there should be no such thing as work upon that plan until observations and examinations and surveys and borings should determine the safety of the proposed works. They have negatived by their professional advice the possibility of the construction of one of the great dams which is the key to the whole canal project. They say that the La Flor Dam can not be built as it is projected, and as to the other at the other end of the 154 miles of elevated water, the Ochoa Dam, they say upon the evidence before them it is probably untrustworthy, at least it is so insufficiently demonstrated as to be unworthy of the expenditure of money upon it until further examination shall have enabled the perfection of the plan and warranted trust in it.

What is the first duty of the United States? It is to make the most thorough, adequate, and careful survey of all the routes which may be available for an isthmian canal, to prepare a plan for the construction of a canal upon that route which shall in the end be deemed most eligible, a plan which does carry with it all the evidence of engineering skill, of completeness of examination, thoroughness of observation, to justify the United States in laying it before the world as fit to base an invitation to the nations of the earth to share in the project.

When that shall have been done, or when, in the course of the work to attain it, it can be seen that that thing will be accomplished, and that we shall be enabled to present to mankind proof, reasonably satisfactory, of the eligibility of the best route, and a plan, with details complete, and specifications elaborately and safely drawn up for the execution of it, then our next step should be to confer with Great Britain, in accordance with our treaty obligations, observing the good faith which ought to bind the United States after entry into an engagement; to confer with Germany, whose interests are equal to ours; to confer with France, who is herself greatly interested in the canal, and our ancient ally and friend, as well as imitator in republican pursuit of liberty. We should confer with those nations of the earth in the grand way of a sovereign, fit as the United States are fit, in strength, in power, in intelligence, in their aspiration for the freedom and happiness of mankind, and seek to establish that canal upon such a foundation as that peace will bless it forever as a great agency of commerce flowing around the globe.

At the same time, and as part of it, our negotiation should extend not with cruel epithets and harsh expletives whenever they choose to assert the dignity that belongs to them not less than to greater governments. Next, our intercourse should embrace with kindliness, with generous favor, with the manliness of the great, the republics of Central America, and in concert with them and the commercial nations of the earth, the leadership of the United States may establish that canal, and never, I believe, in any other way can it be created. Peradventure, it may then seem fitting for the United States, if we shall find constitutional authority for it, even to construct the canal, but I believe the true course—that is my own opinion, both as a matter of constitutional obligation and of highest wisdom and expediency—will be for all commercial nations to unite so as to attract, under the security of their protection, the necessary capital for its construction and operation.

Mr. WHITE. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. It will not.

Mr. WHITE. Do I understand the sum and substance of the Senator's argument to be that he does not favor the plan proposed in the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty, that he does not consider it feasible?

Mr. VILAS. I do not consider the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty such an arrangement for the execution of this work as the United States ought to undertake, but I would, if I had not already occupied so much time, set forth why, and distinguish easily, as I think I could, the true method of procedure from that which governed the terms of that treaty. However, at this hour I shall not detain the Senate longer with that consideration.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for the motion of the Senator from New York?

Mr. VILAS. In one moment. I should like to add just one idea before that motion is made, and that is that the plan which I have suggested—rather the general idea which I have suggested—is not one which will delay the consummation of this great project. In my judgment, it will forward it. For more than two hundred years these half-fledged schemes have been under consideration, until, as the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] has said, the project for a canal on Lake Nicaragua is "blacklisted by the capitalists of the world." There have been twenty concessions given by the Government there which have failed. This is the fourth American concession. Americans have been trying it for eighty years. Here have been ten wasted by this very company in futile pretense of promotion of the project. If we want speed, let us remember the old maxim that slow haste quickest reaches its goal.

I shall not ask the Senator from New York to longer delay the motion he wishes to make.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and nineteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 5, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Rev. JAMES J. DOLLIVER, of Iowa, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth! Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and of the evening to rejoice. Thou art high and lifted up; worshiped by angels and all the host of Heaven. What can feeble dust and ashes do, on this Thy footstool, at a remote distance from Thee, for our salvation, without Thy help?

Draw very near to us and bless us. Prepare us for the duties and the labors of the day upon which we have entered.

May we exalt Thy glory in all we say and all we do, and live with reference to eternity. Bless our land and our country, the land we love the best. May our liberties, civil and religious, be still perpetuated, and the God of our fathers still reign over us.

Bless the President of the United States, the outgoing and the incoming President. Bless the Congress of the United States, all these men in their honorable positions; and may they so labor to promote the interests of this glorious country that at last they may meet the Divine approval of "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Bless the poor and the needy, the oppressed and distressed, the fatherless and the widow; and hasten the time when our world shall become a mountain of holiness, blooming all over with the trees of righteousness.

Bless and save us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LIGHT-HOUSE, ORIENT POINT, LONG ISLAND, NEW YORK.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 853) providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrances to Greenport and Sag Harbor, and the west shore of Shelter Island.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Light-House Board is hereby authorized and directed to erect a light-house at the site of the beacon heretofore existing at Orient Point, or Oyster Pond Reef, on the west side of Plum Gut, at the entrance of Long Island Sound, in the State of New York, and the said Board shall also erect beacon lights or gas buoys at the following points in the county of Suffolk, N. Y.:

First. On Hay Beach Point, Shelter Island.
Second. At the end of the Greenport breakwater, Greenport.
Third. On Conklings Point, about 2 miles west of Greenport.
Fourth. On Rocky or Stearns Point, on Shelter Island.
Fifth. On Hallocks or Paradise Point, on Great Hog Neck, opposite Shelter Island.
Sixth. On Tyndalls Point or Clarks Point, north of Sag Harbor.
Seventh. On the shoal south of West Neck Harbor, on Shelter Island.
Eighth. On the shoal about three-fourths of a mile north of the Sag Harbor wharf, Long Island.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $65,000, to be available immediately, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing and placing the foregoing light-house, beacons, and buoys.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to substitute for the bill just read the one which I send to the desk.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting as follows:

"That the Light-House Board is hereby authorized and directed to erect a light-house with fog signal at the site of the beacon heretofore standing at Orient Point, or Oyster Point Reef, on the west side of Plum Gut, at the entrance to Long Island Sound, in the State of New York: Provided, That the cost of such light-house and its equipment shall not exceed the sum of $30,000."

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report on this bill.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The report (by Mr. CORLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 853) providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrances to Greenport and Sag Harbor and the west shoal of Shelter Island, report the same back with an amendment, and recommend that the bill thus amended do pass.

The correspondence from the Department herewith submitted shows the necessity for the proposed legislation.

The committee recommend to amend by striking out all of section 2.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 15, 1896.

SIR: The letter from your committee of January 6, 1896, inclosing House bill No. 853, providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrance to Greenport and Sag Harbor and the west shoal of Shelter Island, and asking suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage, has been received.

This matter was referred to the Light-House Board, which has replied that it recommends the establishment of a light-house and steam whistle at Orient Point or Oyster Pond Reef, at the entrance of Plum Gut, Long Island, and gas beacons on eight points or shoals on the course to Greenport Harbor, and thence to Sag Harbor.

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 853 was favorably reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and has been upon the Calendar since the 3d of March, 1896.

On the 29th day of April last, I asked unanimous consent for its consideration, and after an exciting debate, wholly unlooked for, and covering the whole range of national expenditures, objection was made by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] to the provision in the bill for gas buoys. He insisted that it was unnecessary, as buoys, if needed, could be provided by the Light-House Board from the general fund for that purpose. I declined to withdraw the provision until I had time for consultation with the Board. I now, by the consent of the committee, present a substitute for the bill, which asks simply for a light-house with fog signal, with the restriction that the total cost of the light-house and equipment shall not exceed $30,000. I also send to the desk a letter from the Light-House Board stating that if the classification formerly made by the Board were still in use this light would be defined as "indispensable."

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., May 11, 1896.

SIR: Your letter of May 11, 1896, asking that the Light-House Board classify the proposed light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, N. Y., has been received.

In reply, I have the honor to state that the practice of classifying proposed light stations as "indispensable," "necessary," and "desirable," is no longer followed. Had this classification still been in use, Orient Point light and fog-signal station would have been classed as "indispensable."

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

Hon. R. C. MCCORMICK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was under the impression that the gentleman offered a new bill as a substitute for the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment just agreed to was the substitute.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title of the bill will be amended so as to conform to the recommendation of the committee.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. McCORMICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HUDSON RESERVOIR AND CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 9029) to grant to the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company the right of way through the Gila River Indian Reservation was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the Territory of Arizona, be, and the said corporation is hereby, authorized and empowered to locate, construct, own, maintain, and operate its main line of canal through and across the Indian reservation situated in the Territory of Arizona, known as the Gila River Reservation, occupied by the Pima, Maricopa, and Sacaton Indians, from a point on the northerly line of said reservation, running thence by the most practicable route to the southerly line of said reservation, and to construct, own, maintain, and operate such aqueducts, flumes, siphons, bridges, and other structures as may be necessary for the conveyance of water where the same can not be conveyed in the canal itself, and the development, utilization, and transmission of any power derived from the water so carried.

SEC. 2. That a right of way 50 feet in width on each side of said main canal is hereby granted to said Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company: Provided, That no part of the lands granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be reasonably necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said canal and said other structures; but when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the tribe or tribes of Indians from which the same shall have been taken, or, in case they shall have ceased to occupy the same, to the United States: And provided further, That when any such lands shall be taken for the purposes aforesaid the consent of the occupants thereof shall be obtained in a manner satisfactory to the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. That before said canal or other structures shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian tribes through which the same may be constructed, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such canal or other structures, the amount of such compensation to be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and to be subject to his final approval.

SEC. 4. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located line through said Indian reservation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and that said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any grading or construction upon any section or part of said located line shall be begun: Provided, That said canal and other structures be located and constructed with a due regard for the rights of the Indians and especially so as not to interfere with their irrigating ditches.

SEC. 5. That the officers, servants, and employees of said company necessary to the construction, maintenance, management, and operation of the structures hereby authorized shall be allowed to reside while so engaged upon the lands herein granted, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws, and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the said intercourse laws.

SEC. 6. That said company shall have the right to survey and locate its canal immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 7. That in connection with the said canal and its appurtenances said company shall have the right to erect, maintain, and use a telegraph or telephone line, or both, and other appliances reasonably necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the said canal and its appurtenances, but only within and upon the limits of the right of way hereby granted.

SEC. 8. That the said Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors, and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking toward changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their lands, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian tribes any further grant of land or its occupancy than is hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 9. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, add to, or repeal this act.

SEC. 10. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was read, as follows:

At the end of section 8 insert the following:

Provided, That the rights herein granted are upon the express condition that the grantee thereof, its successors or assigns, shall at all times during the continuance of the grant furnish the Indians located under its canal along said right of way with water sufficient for all domestic and agricultural purposes and purposes of irrigation on such just and reasonable terms and under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have the report read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURPHY] to state whether this bill has been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. The amendment which has been reported by the committee in connection with this bill was suggested by the Interior Department. The Secretary of the Interior has recommended that with this amendment the bill be passed. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Arizona has indicated his willingness to have the report read, which I ask may be done, reserving the right to object.

The report (by Mr. FLYNN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9029) to grant to the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company the right of way through the Gila River Indian Reservation, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

The grantee, the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company, proposes to construct a storage reservoir in the Tonto Basin, in Arizona, for the purpose of impounding and storing the surplus and flood waters of the drainage basin of the upper Salt River, the same to be used in irrigating the Salt River and Gila valleys. To utilize all the waters of this reservoir the grantee finds it advisable to construct an irrigating canal across the Gila River Indian Reservation, so as to reach the public lands south thereof. This canal will likewise be available, under proper arrangement, for a supply of water to the Indians on the reservation for irrigation purposes—a fact of much importance. This reservation is known as an "Executive order" reservation, but the honorable Secretary of the Interior holds that the act of March 3, 1891, granting to reservoirs the right of way over the public lands, does not apply to this reservation; hence the necessity of this bill.

The committee having referred the bill to the honorable Secretary of the Interior for his opinion thereof, with a request that he make suggestions as to any desirable amendment, the honorable Secretary has transmitted to this committee, with his approval, a recommendation of the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the bill be amended by inserting at the end of section 8 the following proviso:

"Provided, That the rights herein granted are upon the express condition that the grantee thereof, its successors or assigns, shall at all times during the continuance of the grant furnish the Indians located under its canal along said right of way with water sufficient for all domestic and agricultural purposes and purposes of irrigation on such just and reasonable terms and under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The committee recommend that the bill be amended as suggested, by the insertion of the said proviso, and that it do pass.

The correspondence on the subject had with the Department of the Interior is appended.

Mr. DOCKERY. How much land does this convey?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. No land except the right of way.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the width of the right of way?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I think the bill states it. I do not remember the exact width—25 feet, I think.

Mr. DOCKERY. The bill as proposed to be amended has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. In the event that the land should cease to be used for this purpose, it will revert to the United States?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLUE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ELIZABETH WELLONS.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 8898) to increase the pension of Elizabeth Wellons was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Elizabeth Wellons, widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, from $12 per month to $20 per month.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been favorably reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. My anxiety to have it passed at once is because the beneficiary is a lady 82 years old, and because, this being a House bill, it must go through the Senate before she can receive what the bill proposes to grant her. The Committee on Pensions has carefully considered the measure and unanimously recommend that it become a law. As shown by the report, Mrs. Wellons is dependent upon her pension for a livelihood. She can not live very long, for she is very old and feeble. There are very few pensioners of the war of 1812, and they are fast passing away. I sincerely hope no one will object to the present consideration of this bill. It is most meritorious.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHRISTOPHER ELLIS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the Senate bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. 895) for the relief of Christopher Ellis was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion and grant an honorable discharge in the case of Christopher Ellis, who was a machinist in the United States Navy, and who is charged with having deserted from the U. S. S. Nipsic February 7, 1872.

Mr. ERDMAN. Has this bill been considered in the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. FLETCHER. It has not been; but it is a Senate bill, and its passage is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. This is the bill which I showed to the gentleman yesterday morning.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us hear the report.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state that the bill has been favorably reported upon by the Secretary of the Navy.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, but was interrupted by

Mr. ERDMAN, who said: I withdraw the demand for the reading of the report. I know about this case.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, POINT ARENA, CALIFORNIA.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. BARHAM], who desires to bring up a public bill.

Mr. BARHAM. I ask the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk.

The bill (S. 3320) to provide a life-saving station at or near Point Arena, Mendocino County, in the State of California, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to establish a life-saving station at or near Point Arena, Mendocino County, in the State of California.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. NELSON) was read, as follows:

This bill was referred by your committee to the Treasury Department, by whom it was referred to the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, who has made a favorable report thereon, which is hereto appended. In view of the facts stated in this report, it is evident that a life-saving station is urgently needed at the point proposed in the bill.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference of the 10th ultimo, of bill S. 3320, "to provide a life-saving station at or near Point Arena, Mendocino County, in the State of California," and asking for suggestions touching its merits and the propriety of its passage.

In reply I have to state that the matter was referred to the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for report, which has been received, and is herewith transmitted with my concurrence.

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your reference of bill S. 3320, "to provide a life-saving station at or near Point Arena, Mendocino County, in the State of California," forwarded by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

Point Arena is not far from midway between the two nearest life-saving stations—the Humboldt Bay station on the north and the Point Reyes station on the south, which are nearly 200 miles apart—and is the most dangerous place upon this stretch of coast. The dangers are chiefly due to the fact that the point is the extreme western limit of land, and vessels sailing along the coast having to change their courses off this headland—approach it to bring the land in sight by day or the light located upon it by night—and are in danger of being brought within the influence of the strong inshore current and the heavy swells which prevail there.

The records of this office show that since the year 1886 twelve disasters have occurred in this immediate vicinity, in which fifteen lives were lost and property to the amount of $436,800 out of $485,600 involved, seven of the vessels being total losses.

The interests of commerce and humanity would be subserved by the passage of the bill.

Respectfully, yours,

S. I. KIMBALL,
General Superintendent.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. What amount of expense will the construction of this proposed life-saving station involve?

Mr. BARHAM. I am informed by the gentleman who reported the bill to the House that the estimated expense is $5,000.

Mr. MILES. Does the bill simply authorize the construction of this life-saving station?

Mr. BARHAM. Yes; it simply authorizes its construction.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall not object; but I think hereafter in these matters there ought to be some specific estimate as to the amount of expense involved.

Mr. BLUE. Is the estimate included as part of the report?

Mr. BARHAM. No, sir; but it is in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LOUD. This simply authorizes the establishment of the life-saving station at that point. We appropriate each year a certain amount of money for this purpose, which is handled by the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, and it is at his option whether he shall establish the station or not.

Mr. BLUE. But if the authorization is made, you may be very sure that the expenditure will be incurred.

Is there a report from the Light-House Commissioner here?

Mr. LOUD. This is not a light-house matter. It is a life-saving station.

Mr. BLUE. All right.

There being no objection, the Senate bill was considered, read three times, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish the gentleman would defer that motion to enable me to call up a bill on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GROUT. At the request of the gentleman from New York, I will withdraw the motion temporarily.

MRS. MARY GOULD CARR.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up from the Speaker's table and ask the House to consider at this time the bill (S. 3623) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Gould Carr, the widow of the late Brigadier and Brevet Major General Carr, United States Volunteers, deceased.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to say in regard to this bill that a similar one was passed by both the House and Senate at the last session of Congress, and was sent to the President; but the President held the bill during the recess and until the expiration of ten days after the recess had commenced. In other words, it suffered what is called a "pocket veto."

This bill is precisely the same as that which passed the Senate and the House last year. It has now passed the Senate and comes here for our action. Of course the Committee on Invalid Pensions has examined the bill and reported favorably upon it. It has been through the House in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and has been reported favorably to the House, and passed the House by an emphatic vote.

Mr. HULL. Let me ask the gentleman if the Committee on Invalid Pensions did not report this bill at $50 a month?

Mr. PAYNE. My impression is that the committee reported the bill at $75 a month, and that the House reduced it to $50 per month. It went to the Senate, and the Senate refused to concur in the House amendment, and a committee of conference examined the amendment and reported it back to the House, recommending $75 a month, which report was adopted.

Mr. MILES. My recollection is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended, in the first instance, $75 per month.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct.

Mr. PAYNE. My impression is that it is so reported.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. This is to pension the widow of a private soldier. I believe?

Mr. PAYNE. No, sir.

Mr. HULICK. Is it for a general officer?

Mr. PAYNE. It is.

Mr. HULICK. Then I think we ought to do something for the widows of general officers. Of course the privates have no right to expect anything. I might illustrate by saying that a few days ago I got recognition from the Speaker to offer a bill in behalf of a private soldier, but the gentleman from New York objected.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not object; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HULICK. I beg pardon, then; I was under the impression that the gentleman had objected.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLUE. If I understand the parliamentary status of this matter, it will be subject to amendment if the House considers it?

Mr. PAYNE. I will state to the gentleman that I will yield to him to make a motion to amend the bill if he desires to do it, if the House shall take it up for consideration at this time.

Mr. BLUE. With that understanding, I shall not object.

There being no objection, the bill was considered.

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BLUE. Now, I move to amend the bill by making it read $50 per month, instead of $75 a month.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in regard to that I wish only to say that the House has already considered that very question, and after debate concluded that $75 a month was the correct figure. I hope the bill will be allowed to pass just as it comes from the Senate and as the House fixed the amount after full consideration. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

If the gentleman from Kansas desires to be heard on his amendment, I will yield to him.

Mr. BLUE. I do desire to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in reply to that that if the House made a mistake that is no reason why they should not correct the mistake. These pensions, it seems to me, are all excessive. The full amount to be granted, unless it be an exceptional case, ought never to exceed $50 a month, and this is not an exceptional case. Fifty dollars is amply sufficient, and this disposition to make exceptions in favor of the widows of general officers, and in favor of general officers themselves, is what breeds discontent among the people of the United States, and is one of the important factors in bringing about socialistic conditions everywhere throughout the land. There is no good reason for these large pensions to widows and to general officers, and I trust the House will avail itself of this opportunity to correct the mistake heretofore made by agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have some memory of this case, and if my memory serves me correctly this is the status, that the injuries from which the officer finally died were not received in the service. On the contrary, after he left the service he was for a long time a prominent official and able to discharge public duties at a high compensation in the service of his State.

This is not one of the cases where the soldier was killed in battle or where he received his injuries from which he finally died in battle, or was so disabled by his war service as to prevent him from earning a livelihood after the close of the war. If I remember, also, it is one of those cases that was recommended by the House at a smaller rate than was finally agreed upon. I will not be so positive about that, but my recollection is that it went to the Senate, that the Senate increased the amount, and that the conference committee did what is generally done by conference committees in these cases, gave the highest amount, and then the bill died in the hands of the Executive.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, General Carr was one of the most gallant officers in the war and saw a great deal of hard service. He received injuries in the service for which he was afterwards pensioned, but he did not receive in the service the injury from which he died. He died from the effects of cancer. He died a poor man, and left his widow at an advanced age. It is true he held civil office. He was, at three different times, elected secretary of state of the State of New York, and was elected when no one else upon his ticket was elected, because of the high esteem in which he was held, not only by members of his own party, but by members of the Democratic party.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the compensation which is given to that officer in New York?

Mr. PAYNE. The compensation now, I think, is $5,000 a year. I think it was less than that at the time that General Carr held it, but I would not be positive about that. I know what the compensation is now.

Now, in regard to this case, it is as meritorious as cases which Congress has heretofore passed at $75 a month, not excluding the case of the general from Kansas, which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] saw fit to advocate at that rate.

Mr. MILES. Is this the war widow of General Carr?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; he married her in 1845, and Mrs. Carr herself served during the war as a volunteer nurse, for which service she never received a dollar of pay. The case is certainly a meritorious one, and I hope that the House will not cut down the pension after having on a previous occasion, by an overwhelming majority, voted that the pension should be $75 a month.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. HULL. When the bill was before the House as an original proposition, is it not true that, after discussion, the House cut it down to $50 a month?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the House cut it down to $50 a month, but not after much discussion, as I remember.

Mr. HULL. My recollection is that there was a very full discussion.

Mr. PAYNE. This widow is an old lady, some 76 years of age at the present time; and after full discussion, on a later occasion, the full House, by an overwhelming vote, fixed the rate at $75 a month.

Mr. HULL. Was not that on a conference report, which carries a great deal of weight with it?

Mr. PAYNE. It was on a conference report, and the same weight ought to attach to the conference report to-day that attached to it when it was presented before.

I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 strike out the words "seventy-five," and insert the word "fifty."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 88, noes 65.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARY W. KEEFFE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 905, "An act granting a pension to Mary W. Keeffe," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted, insert "$25;" and the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

FRANK J. CANNON,
GEO. L. SHOUP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, what is this bill? There is no statement.

Mr. THOMAS. The report of the conference committee was read.

Mr. HULL. Have you got a statement?

Mr. THOMAS. This is simply an amendment.

Mr. HULL. There has to be a statement of the House conferees.

Mr. THOMAS. This bill originally called for $40 a month. That is reduced to $25 a month, and agreed to in conference.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would ask if there is a statement accompanying the conference report?

The SPEAKER. There is no statement.

Mr. LOUD. I think it is a dangerous precedent to pass these bills without a statement accompanying the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no statement. The Chair sustains the point of order.

CAROLINE A. HOUGH.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 2604) to increase the pension of Caroline A. Hough, widow of Brig. Gen. John Hough. It is in the same condition precisely as the bill of Mrs. Carr, which you have just passed in the House. It is the bill of a widow of a soldier, a war widow. The soldier entered the service as a private and was promoted up as far as brigadier-general and chief of staff of an army corps, and died of wounds received in the service. I ask unanimous consent to call it up.

Mr. BLUE. How much is it to give her?

Mr. WOOD. Fifty dollars a month. It is for the widow of Gen. John Hough.

Mr. BLUE. What was the rank?

Mr. WOOD. Brevet brigadier-general.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill, which will be reported?

Mr. MILNES. I suggest that the bill be read before consent is given.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10167.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Commissioners to have the plats of subdivisions of the various squares or tracts of land in Washington County photolithographed, $1,960.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit an amendment to that paragraph. I have not the draft ready at this moment, and will ask to have the paragraph passed for the time being.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special repairs to market houses, $1,500.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, under the permission of the House, given yesterday, upon the report of the Committee on Rules, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the act approved February 13, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes,' approved June 16, 1880," be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and all proceedings pending shall be vacated and on judgment heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid.

Mr. MEREDITH. I want to understand whether there is to be discussion over this matter or not.

Mr. DOCKERY. Go ahead.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I entered my protest on yesterday——

Mr. HULICK. I ask where that comes in?

Mr. DOCKERY. It comes in on page 11, after line 2.

Mr. MEREDITH. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, I entered my protest yesterday against legislation of this kind; and I very well understand this morning I would be leading a forlorn hope to oppose it after what was done yesterday by the Committee on Rules. I say I appreciate that any opposition now would be simply leading a forlorn hope. The House under a misapprehension of facts have made up their minds that this amendment shall be passed, and that a law which was passed by the Fifty-third Congress shall be repealed by the passage of this amendment. I stated yesterday evening that the Committee on the District of Columbia, which are being criticised by some gentlemen, had this matter before them; and I state here to-day for the first time, I knew yesterday that a resolution which was first discussed and about which a hearing had been granted, had been introduced and sent to the committee. It reached the committee on the 15th of December, and the House adjourned on the 22d of December. It was about three weeks after that before any work was done. I simply make that statement, Mr. Chairman, to put the Committee on the District of Columbia in its proper light before this House, and to show that they have not been negligent in their duty.

I say, further, that since the resolution was called to the attention of that committee, which was yesterday, the committee has been engaged in hearing gentlemen interested in that matter who have come before the committee, and we consumed the entire time; in fact, twenty minutes after the House adjourned we were still hearing those gentlemen, and I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that if this House could have heard the statements of gentlemen who are interested in this question, both for the Government and in the interest of the people whose cases are now being determined by the Court of Claims, they would halt in this proceeding, because they would see that gentlemen who have discussed this measure on the floor and who have sought to run through this repeal in this hurried manner, have been misinformed as to the merits of these cases.

Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understand from the statements of its advocates and from the statements of the advocates of its repeal, the District Commissioners and their officials, including the law officer of the District government, the gentlemen employed by the Commissioners to fight these cases in the Court of Claims—if I understand them correctly, this law was passed for the purpose of letting a set of claimants have adjudicated by the Court of Claims their rights under contracts which were made with the old form of District government and extended by the Commissioners when the form of government was changed, and which were known as the "extended contracts," most of them being of that character.

Objections have been urged that these claims are "stale," but, Mr. Chairman, according to the statements of the gentlemen who have appeared before the District committee, these parties have reason to complain that the Government has withheld from them what is actually, equitably, and justly due them. It is stated that these contracts were made with the old form of city government, and that afterwards a board was organized which fixed the rates of compensation, and it is in evidence before the District committee that those rates were advertised to the world, and that contracts were entered into by parties who signed them in blank, with the understanding that they were to be filled out at the board rates.

Now, if it is urged that the board rates were greater than the rates at which persons first took contracts, I urge as a set-off that when the old government found itself unable to carry on the work and pay the contractors in money, it made an arrangement with them by which they were to be paid in 3.65 bonds, which were worth upon the market as low as 50 cents on the dollar, and if the board fixed rates higher than had previously been contracted for, it was a separate and distinct understanding and agreement with the parties engaged in the work that they were not to be paid in money, but were to be paid in bonds worth about 50 cents on the dollar.

Further, Mr. Chairman, I am informed this morning that many of the contractors—nearly all of them, indeed—failed and were ruined by the contracts which they had entered into with the District government. The Commissioners were before the committee this morning—the law officer of the District was before the committee, and also a representative of these claimants. It was stated here yesterday by a gentleman, a member of the Committee on Rules, that they had had a full hearing and investigation of this matter by that committee. I put the question to my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and he said that they had had a full hearing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am informed by a gentleman who stands as high in this community as any man, a gentleman who stands as high as any man who treads this earth, that he, on his way to his office yesterday, was informed for the first time that this matter was coming up before the Committee on Rules, and that, without any opportunity of going and getting his papers or collecting the necessary information to convince the chairman of the service of the same——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman might have saved himself the trouble of misstating what I said if he had looked at the RECORD. I did not say that we had heard the matter fully; I said that we had heard it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I accept the explanation of the gentleman from Texas, and if I used the word "fully," I did not mean to misrepresent him. I understood him to say yesterday that the committee had heard this matter, and, as I have just said, a gentleman made a statement this morning that he was on his way from his office, and that, without the opportunity of going fully into this measure, he had been called to appear before the committee.

Now, I repeat, I know I lead but a forlorn hope in this case, but I believe that I am right in principle, and it is a matter of supreme indifference to me whether this House shall stand by me or not, or whether a single gentleman here will agree with my view. Believing that I am right, if every man here should vote against me, I shall still regard it as a duty to enter my solemn protest against this repeal being rushed through in such a manner and in such a way as is here proposed upon a rule brought in by the Committee on Rules. I say to my friend from Texas, who is a member of that committee, that this is a dangerous precedent.

I say that when Congress has passed a law and that law has received the sanction of the President of the United States and stands upon the statute books of the country, it is a dangerous precedent to let the Committee on Rules, or any other committee, come in here and change our regular methods of procedure, and, by a simple amendment upon an appropriation bill, in this extraordinary way, repeal a law which was passed by a previous Congress and signed by the President. From the testimony which was given before our committee, I am satisfied that if anything should be done about this act now there might perhaps be a modification of any provisions of it which work hardship to the Government, and if gentlemen of the House would acquaint themselves with the facts, and the evidence which establishes those facts, while they might be willing to modify the rule so as to protect the Government's interest in every conceivable way, I do not believe they would go to the extent that they are asked to go here and crush down these people who are right in their charges against the Government—some of them admitted to be right by the District Commissioners—because whatever may have been said about the bill, the Commissioners, when they wrote to the District Committee in reference to the bill then pending before the committee a letter, every line and syllable of which was printed in the report made by Judge ABBOTT, practically agreed that there were outstanding claims against the District government which should be paid; and I do protest, Mr. Chairman, against this law being changed in the manner suggested in the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

I do not desire to detain the House. I am satisfied that many gentlemen of the House concluded yesterday, acting under a misapprehension, that this law should be changed, let the consequences be what they may. I believe that the majority of the House will do this; but they will do it, Mr. Chairman, against my protest, if it is the only protest made in this body.

Mr. GROUT. Of course, the proposition before us to repeal upon an appropriation bill an act already upon the statute books is unusual, and it has seemed to members of the committee, as it seems certainly very clear to me, that there ought to be larger liberty for debate than can be had under the ordinary five-minute restriction. Requesting the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], who seems specially to represent the opposite view of this question, I will ask him what time will be accepted by that side as reasonable for the discussion of this proposition?

Mr. MEREDITH. Suppose you say fifteen minutes.

Mr. MCEWAN. Say twenty minutes. I want five minutes.

Mr. MEREDITH. Well, twenty minutes.

Mr. GROUT. The committee has no desire to suppress discussion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think half an hour ought to be allowed on each side.

Mr. DOCKERY. Say half an hour on each side for general debate.

Mr. GROUT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment proposing to repeal the act of the former Congress be further discussed (without taking account of what has already been said) for one hour, thirty minutes to a side; the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] to control the time against the amendment, and the chairman of the subcommittee or the member in charge of the bill to control the time on the other side.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not think this debate ought to be limited to even one hour. It has been charged or insinuated here that it was proposed to put this amendment through without adequate discussion or a proper understanding of the measure. Although I think I understand the proposition pretty well, I have no doubt that there are many members who do not. I think we ought not to limit the discussion to an hour. Let the opponents of the proposition have all the time they want.

Mr. GROUT. It was the proposition of the other side that the debate be limited to an hour. I think we ought not to act on this question with any unseemly haste. It is really a serious proposition. If the original bill when passed had been deliberately acted on by the House, which it seems was not the case, I should be opposed (however much I might be inclined to repeal that bill) to considering the proposition for its repeal on an appropriation bill. But I am entirely satisfied from my knowledge of these claims that the law ought to be repealed. So I am ready to act upon it with very little discussion. But my acquaintance with the matter extends over a longer time than that of some other gentlemen. I feel that there ought to be the amplest discussion of this proposition, because the repeal of existing law in this way is a practice that ought not to be followed every day. We should not proceed with unseemly haste. What does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] suggest as the limit of time?

Mr. PITNEY. My only purpose was to give the advocates of these claims and the opponents of the amendment the fullest opportunity to explain themselves. I submit the suggestion that an hour be allowed on each side.

Mr. HENDERSON. What say those gentlemen who are opposed to the adoption of the amendment? What do they want?

Mr. MEREDITH. I think half an hour on a side will be satisfactory.

Mr. SAYERS. Those who favor the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri will want an hour for the purpose of fully explaining the character of this measure.

Mr. PITNEY. I think so, too.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, I ask that an hour be allowed to those who oppose the amendment and an hour to those who favor it. Let there be full discussion.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall not object, although I hardly think so much time will be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed that the discussion on the pending amendment be limited to two hours, one hour on each side.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before that request is acted on, I wish to say only a word. As one member of the District Committee, I hardly feel prepared to discuss this question as fully as it ought to be discussed; and for that reason I consented to the short limit of thirty minutes, asking only ten minutes for myself. We had a hearing in the District Committee this morning on this proposition, lasting about two hours, but the subject was not exhausted. Therefore I say the members of the District Committee are not all prepared to speak. If the House wants to cut down the discussion to thirty minutes, or to an hour, I shall be content, confining myself to ten minutes; and then when the District Committee shall report a measure, as I think they will, with reference to this matter we can discuss the question more fully. For myself I think that one hour will be enough. But if the committee wishes to extend the time to two hours, I will consent to that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, has not the proposition for two hours been agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that debate on the pending amendment be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] and one hour by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand, then, that the vote on this proposition will be taken about 3 o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You mean that members will absent themselves in the meantime. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. No; but I do not want the members to go away under a misapprehension, or a misunderstanding as to when the vote will take place.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate, by order of the committee, is limited to two hours, one of which will be controlled by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] and the other by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH]. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GROUT. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, in order that the House may thoroughly understand the manner in which the law which is sought to be repealed by the amendment to this appropriation bill passed the House, I will send to the Clerk's desk the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, and ask to have read on pages 1738 and 1785 the marked portions bearing upon this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the RECORD of February 4, 1895.]

SETTLEMENT OF OUTSTANDING CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (S. 2165) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to have an explanation of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will make a short explanation of the bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. This bill is intended to adjust certain claims now pending against the District of Columbia. These claims originated in this way: During the period of time when the board of public works had charge of improvements in the District of Columbia they established what were known as "board rates," under which these improvements were made. There were a great number of contracts made under this arrangement.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, is this bill before the House by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent that it be considered.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman to let it lie over for a day or two until I can look into it. Otherwise I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. There is no appropriation made.

Mr. SAYERS. That makes no difference. It probably will entail on the Government a very heavy expenditure.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I have no objection to letting it lie on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SAYERS. No. Withdraw it for the present.

The SPEAKER. This is a bill which the Chair has laid before the House for reference.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I object to its present consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Would the gentleman be satisfied if the bill should lie on the Speaker's table for the present until I can get an opportunity to examine it, and should then be again laid before the House, so that I may have an opportunity to get the Senate bill passed, if possible? Can not the Chair retain it on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, the Chair will do so with pleasure.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Then I ask unanimous consent that that course be taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill lie on the Speaker's table for a few days.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

[From the RECORD of February 5, 1895.]

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Speaker again laid before the House the bill (S. 2165) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. The bill was laid before the House yesterday, and was allowed to lie on the table so as to permit the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to have an opportunity to look into it. He has done so.

The SPEAKER. The bill will again be reported.

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have an explanation of the bill to the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That in the adjudication of claims brought under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved the 16th of June, 1880 (21 Statutes at Large, page 284), the Court of Claims shall allow the rates established and paid by the board of public works; and whenever said rates have not been allowed the claimant or his personal representative shall be entitled, on motion made within sixty days after the passage of this act, to a new trial of such cause."

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. When the board of audit, which was the board which succeeded to the board of public works in the District of Columbia, and to whom was referred quite a number of claims pending against the District, expired by limitation, there were many of these claims that were unadjusted and were referred to the Court of Claims. The law required that these contracts made under the board of public works should be made in writing; but as matter of fact that law was not obeyed. A great many of the contractors are persons who did work and performed service by oral contracts with the board of public works. It came to pass in time that the Congress of the United States proposed to make some investigation into these matters, and it was thought desirable then that the contracts should be put in writing.

It was left with the clerk of the board to draw up the contracts in proper form for signature by these persons who had been employed by the board of public works. In some instances he made a mistake as to the rate of pay these parties were entitled to. Therefore, when they went before the Court of Claims, although they showed that the contract was different from that stated in the written instrument, the court held the parties to their contract as expressed in the writing, and refused to allow all proof of what the real contract was. Now, the object of this bill is simply to allow these parties to go back to the Court of Claims and recover such amount as they actually contracted to receive from the board of public works.

Mr. SAYERS. Does that bill contain any appropriation?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It contains no appropriation. The appropriation has heretofore been made to pay them by act of Congress, and certain bonds were authorized to be issued; and those bonds are held in the Treasury for the payment of these claims.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, this fully explains to the committee, so far as the RECORD shows, what transpired in the House when the bill was passed. I had the assurance of Judge Cobb, of Alabama, that at the most this bill would involve an expenditure of only thirty or forty thousand dollars; and also that it had received the approval and indorsement of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Having received that assurance from him, and the explanation made by him that it would involve but a limited amount, I withdrew my objection to the unanimous consent asked.

Now, I wish to call the attention of this committee especially to the explanation given by Judge Cobb, and to show how widely at variance it is from the facts as they have developed under the enforcement of the law. Judge Cobb says:

> The object of this bill is simply to allow these parties to go back to the Court of Claims and recover such amount as they actually contracted to receive from the board of public works.

This was the statement of the gentleman in charge of the bill, that the only effect of the bill would be to allow these parties to go back to the Court of Claims for the purpose of recovering such amounts as they had actually contracted to receive from the board of public works. If I understood the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] correctly on yesterday, and I believe the day before, when speaking upon this subject, he said that these contracts called for a certain amount of expenditure, and that the object of this law and the result of its enforcement would be to enable parties interested to go outside of their positive contracts and obtain the higher prices for their labor and material that had been allowed by the board of public works to other contractors. That the men who were to be the beneficiaries of the law, having received payment from the Government according to their contract, which had been actually entered into for the performance of the work, had given their receipts and thereby discharged the Government from all obligations for further payment on account of the service rendered. It does seem to me, if the statement by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] be true—and I have no doubt whatever that it is true, because the gentleman would not have otherwise made it——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think the gentleman from New Jersey stated that that condition applied to all persons holding claims of this character.

Mr. SAYERS. I can not recall the number of claims specified, if they were specified——

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). It applies to some, undoubtedly, but not to all.

Mr. SAYERS. But I have been informed, Mr. Chairman, that under the operation of this law parties have been enabled to secure judgments utterly at variance with the explanation of the provisions of the law as given by Mr. Cobb, of Alabama, on the occasion to which I have referred. I would never have consented that the bill should come before the House for consideration by unanimous consent if I had thought for a moment that any other interpretation of the law would be given to it except as stated when the bill was presented by the gentleman from Alabama, in whom I had then, and have now, the greatest confidence.

But there is something more connected with the matter. It was stated to me by the gentleman from Alabama that this special bill had received the indorsement and approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. He so believed. Taking the report of the Senate upon this bill, which assumed to quote verbatim et literatim the letter of the Commissioners, and upon which Mr. Cobb made probably that statement, it was literally true. But the committee will find during the course of this debate that, for some cause or other, and by some hand or another, the vital and essential portions of the letter of the Commissioners had been stricken out. All the safeguards the Commissioners recommended to be attached to the bill to protect the Government were omitted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow another interruption? I know my friend would not desire to create a wrong impression.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That entire letter is printed in the report of his colleague, Judge ABBOTT, who made the report on the bill. The entire letter to which he refers is there quoted, and the gentleman's colleague is present who will verify that statement.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not refer——

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). And that is the only letter of the Commissioners. The gentleman is laboring under a mistake in the statement he makes.

Mr. SAYERS. I think the gentleman is referring to another subject. Does the gentleman seek to controvert the statement I have made in regard to the report from the Senate?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No.

Mr. SAYERS. What then?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say that a part of the letter only was printed in the report of the Senate, but the entire letter was submitted to this House in the report of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT].

Mr. SAYERS. I am referring to the letter that was incorporated as a part of the Senate report.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What I mean to say is——

Mr. SAYERS. And that was what may have deceived Judge Cobb.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no difference between us, except that the Senate report did not contain the whole letter; but the entire letter of the Commissioners was submitted in the report of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] to this House, so that there was no advantage taken of the House, and I know my friend would not want to create the impression that a part of the letter was suppressed for any bad effect, because the entire letter was submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] in his report on this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I am stating to the committee, as I believe, the grounds on which the House permitted the bill to pass and to become law; first, that the expenditure would not involve over $30,000 or $40,000; second, that it had received the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and lastly, that the proper interpretation of the bill was given by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Cobb.

I repeat that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] should be adopted. There should be no mere suspension of this very objectionable law, but this House should put the seal of its condemnation, not only on the measure itself, but also on the manner in which it was passed through the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield the remainder of my time, if I have any, back to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. GROUT. Now, will the other side occupy the floor?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time that I shall occupy the floor, I shall not assert that all of these claims should be paid. If my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will listen to me for a moment or two, I think we shall not disagree.

It seems that the object contemplated in the act passed in the Fifty-third Congress was a good one, and the District Commissioners recommended it. There is no controversy about that.

Mr. SAYERS. No; they did not recommend it. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Commissioners recommended the bill which was passed by the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. HULICK. I understood the gentleman to make that declaration, that it was on the approval of the Commissioners.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not say that. I said that the object had in view in the legislation was a good one, and that the District Commissioners recommended the object in view, at first, which was the passage of a bill which would authorize persons holding these claims to go to the Court of Claims and ascertain if anything was justly due to them.

Mr. HULICK. But let us understand. They did not recommend this specific act.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I have not said so, and I do not say so.

Mr. HULICK. I want the committee to understand that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say they did not recommend this act, and I hope I may be understood. They did not recommend this act, but they favored the object of the legislation, which was the submission of some of these claims to the Court of Claims, that there might be an ascertainment if there was anything fairly due to the claimants. That is what they favored, and they say so this morning.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this morning the Committee on the District of Columbia had before it the two Commissioners of the District, the president of the Board, Mr. Ross, and Mr. Truesdell, and the auditor of the District, and one or two other officers representing the District, and two Assistant Attorneys-General of the United States, representing the Government of the United States, and also had the gentleman whose name has been mentioned here, Mr. Hemphill, as the attorney representing some of these claims. Now, we listened for two hours to the debate pro and con, endeavoring to get at the real facts in respect to these claims. The hearing was not completed when the time came for us to come upon the floor of this House at 12 o'clock.

It is an intricate question, Mr. Chairman, and while it is intricate it is easy to understand; but there is difficulty in the position of my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], and of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], who are conscientious legislators, seeking to do right in this case, and to prevent the Government from being robbed. The difficulty with them is that they combine and bring together the just claims—and there are some of these claims which are just—with the unmeritorious claims which are presented. Now, what we ought to do as legislators, if we can, is to provide some remedy by which those having honest claims can get to the Court of Claims and get them allowed, and the dishonest ones be rejected.

I am frank to say that the bill which we are now considering, and which we are seeking to repeal, goes too far. It does provide on its face, absolutely, that the Court of Claims shall allow "the board rates" in every case. I did not think it was subject to that construction. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] who made the report upon it did not think possibly that the law which was passed would admit of that construction. But the Court of Claims has placed that construction upon it, and has held that it has no discretion and that it must allow the entire sum fixed by what is known as "the board rates;" and that, not having any discretion, it must allow all of these claims, and therefore gentlemen have now come forward, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]—who have been paid, as they once thought, in full, and paid as the Government supposed, in full, and for which they executed their receipts in full, but not as much as "board rates"—have now come in under this act and presented new claims, based on the language of this act, and they say that they are arbitrarily to be allowed "the board rates," because this act, passed in the Fifty-third Congress, says so.

I tried to state that yesterday, and I am trying to state it here this morning. What does the committee find? It finds these facts developed this morning. You are going to repeal the law. And when you do so, what do you do? You shut out meritorious claims, but you also shut out those which the District Commissioners admit are equitable and just and some of which ought to be paid. Are you going to do that? You will if you pass this amendment. You say, "Oh, well, let the meritorious ones go, in order to get rid of the unmeritorious claims." I do not think we ought to legislate in that way. I do not think that the amendment ought to pass. I think that the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to report a bill repealing this act, and substituting in place of it a proper bill; and that is one that will allow these parties that admittedly have just claims to present them to the Court of Claims, under proper restrictions, and have them adjudicated properly and fairly. Is there anybody who objects to that? If so, I have offended him. I do not think we ought to go to the broad extent of absolutely and unconditionally repealing this act.

Mr. MILES. What is the difficulty about your committee doing that after this law has been repealed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It can be done that way. I suppose we will go on with the hearings; but I am speaking about the real situation. I say that the better way is to let the Committee on the District of Columbia report upon it. A bill was introduced in December for the repeal of this act, and our attention was called to it by the District Commissioners in a pro forma way. Gentlemen must remember that it is not possible for the District Committee to consider more than one-third or half of the measures that are presented to them. We take them up in order and dispose of them in a business way under our efficient chairman, and if it had been specially called to our attention we would have taken it up, as we are in the habit of taking up bills that our attention is especially directed to. I do not think that this committee or this House ought to repeal this bill that will shut off persons who have meritorious claims from having them adjudicated in the Court of Claims. Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] says that he was misled by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Cobb, unintentionally. We would all exonerate Judge Cobb, and I know my friend would.

Mr. DOCKERY. He did.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He did so. I said he would do it. Judge ABBOTT, of Texas, a member of the committee, made the report. Judge Cobb did not make the report, but it was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT]. Judge Cobb simply had charge of the bill on the floor. My friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] says that Judge Cobb misled him in stating that the claims were only $30,000 or $40,000. I may be mistaken in the hasty reading of the statement of Judge Cobb. I do not think he intimated that. If the gentleman from Texas is on the floor, will he look at it?

Mr. DOCKERY. He is not in the House at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Here is what Judge Cobb said. I have read it hastily. Will my friend from Missouri look at it here. [Offering the RECORD.] I do not think Judge Cobb said that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] assumed that he made that remark on the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be. I was about to say that Judge Cobb may have made a remark to him off the floor about that. But be that as it may, it does not reach the merits of the question. The statement made by the gentleman, Mr. Hemphill, who presented it to the District Committee, was that the claims would amount to $70,000 or $75,000; and his attention being called to that this morning, he stated it was that amount, and not $1,400,000, as claimed by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY]. Mr. Hemphill very promptly stated, in reply to the question, that the proper and just claims, which he supposed would be all that would be presented, would be about $70,000 or $75,000. But he said that other parties, taking advantage of this act, have rushed in and have filed claims amounting to a million and a quarter.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit me one moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman inquire of Mr. Hemphill whether he was not before the Committee on Rules yesterday morning, accompanied by a client of his for whom a single judgment has been rendered by the Court of Claims for $122,000, which is now under appeal simply on the question of interest, and this for only one of these claims?

Mr. MILNES. That question was up this morning in the committee, and I never heard any statement of any such judgment. The referees in one case had rendered a decision in favor of one claimant for $70,000, and not $122,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan is——

Mr. MILNES. There was no judgment rendered.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, my statement was made that there was a judgment, and the auditor of the District is in the gallery and he can be called to the lobby if necessary to satisfy members upon the question of fact as to whether a judgment has been rendered. An appeal is now pending, and the principal point relied upon by the appellant is simply a question of interest, but there is no doubt that a judgment has been rendered by the Court of Claims.

Mr. MILNES. The gentleman is mistaken. The United States attorney of this government says there has been no such judgment rendered. The referee in this case has recommended that this party be paid $70,000.

Mr. PITNEY. Plus interest.

Mr. MILNES. And the question of interest is now before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MAHON. I hope they will make them pay it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that both these gentlemen are correct. I am not sure but there has been a judgment rendered in one case, as suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], for $70,000; at any rate, for an amount considerably larger than Mr. Hemphill thought these claims would amount to.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will permit me, the auditor stated this morning that the total amount for which judgment was rendered was $81,660.

Mr. GROUT. Were the names of the parties in whose favor those judgments were given stated before your committee?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. MILNES. That is to say, out of over $400,000 claims passed upon, four-fifths were dismissed entirely.

Mr. PITNEY. No; only twenty-six were dismissed.

Mr. MILNES. Four-fifths of the claims considered by the court were dismissed. Claims amounting to over $400,000 were acted upon, and over four-fifths were dismissed, and out of that total of over $400,000 judgment was given for some $80,000.

Mr. PITNEY. I make my statement upon the authority of the auditor, and upon the authority of the auditor's official report to the Commissioners, which I have before me, that these claims which were pending on the 11th of January, 1897, after dismissing those to which the gentleman refers, amounted, with interest, to about $1,400,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is correct about that. Claims have been piled up amounting to about $1,400,000.

Mr. MILNES. The attorney for the United States said to the District Committee this morning that in the greater part of these cases now pending the claims were for the difference between the par value of the 3.65 bonds in which payment had been made and the amount the bonds actually sold for, and that the court had already decided that that difference could not be considered, so that those cases, or a very large part of them, have gone by the board.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was about to state that. Claims of the kind described by the gentleman from Michigan have gone out of the count entirely, but such claims had been piled up and are counted in making up this total.

Mr. DOCKERY. When I take the floor, I will state in my time the items of the cases now on the docket remaining unadjudicated. They amount to $851,440.52 without interest.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no controversy about that.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas is now in the Hall, and I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to repeat what he said a while ago about the statement of the gentleman from Texas as to what had been said to him by Judge Cobb about the amount of these claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What I said was that I did not think the gentleman from Texas would be able to find in Judge Cobb's remarks in the RECORD any statement that the claims under that proposed legislation would amount to only thirty or forty thousand dollars.

Mr. SAYERS. I never claimed that. What I said was that Judge Cobb told me, and that others interested in the passage of the bills told me, that these claims would not amount to more than that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no doubt the gentleman is correct in his statement. Mr. Chairman, there is no controversy but that these claims have piled up to the amount of $1,400,000. There is no controversy either but that, under the law prescribed by the Court of Claims, 70 per cent of all those claims will be eliminated. That was stated this morning before the Committee on the District by gentlemen for and by gentlemen against these claims. Therefore the whole amount which will go before the court will not exceed three or four hundred thousand dollars, and the court can reject such of the claims included in that amount as it finds to be improper. Whether the court will do right or not I do not know. I assume that it will, and I believe it will. But some portions of these claims it can not reject under the present law because that law says that the court shall allow "board rates," which we do not think ought to be allowed, and which probably the court will not think ought to be allowed, but the law is mandatory. For that reason I think that instead of striking the law absolutely from the statute book it should be so modified and limited as to give the court some discretion in its finding and not direct it arbitrarily to make a certain finding.

The trouble with the pending proposition is that this Committee of the Whole is not in a condition to act with full knowledge upon this question. In the Committee on the District we spent two hours this morning listening to both sides—and that is the only way to get at the facts; to hear both sides face to face. I believe that in an hour longer the committee could have reported a measure which would be absolutely satisfactory to the District Commissioners, who are guarding the interests of the people of this District and of the United States as well as honest and efficient men can guard them. The Commissioners are seeking to do right; the District Committee is seeking to do right. I believe this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union wishes to do right about this matter, but unfortunately I am not in a position to give them all the facts. I wish I were, but there are some facts in the case that I do not understand myself, because our hearing was cut off arbitrarily by the meeting of the House.

Mr. MILES. After all, however, can any injustice come from the repeal of the existing law?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; the denial of a hearing to persons whose claims are admitted to be just.

Mr. PITNEY. They are not admitted to be just.

Mr. MILES. But I assume that the District Committee will go on and discharge its duty to these claimants, and when it finds, as the gentleman thinks it has found, that the existing law is wrong, that committee will probably propose an amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We probably could amend the law so as to make it satisfactory. I say frankly, however, that if, after full investigation, I should change my opinion, I would not be in favor of any modification; but I think there ought to be a full hearing before we are called upon to undo what has been done by a previous Congress. I think the law might well be modified; I think it goes too far; but at the same time I do think that some of these claims are meritorious, and that an opportunity for the consideration of them ought to be given.

Now, it seems to me it would have been better to let the District of Columbia Committee formulate a proper measure, giving relief to these parties who have honest claims, and have it considered under the rules of the House. I agree with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], who says that this method of legislation is one that we ought not to enter upon hastily. It is not a kind of legislation that we ought to encourage, one evidence of which is that the rules of this House, adopted by a majority of its members, prohibit us from considering measures of this kind in this way. In the last Congress, if I may so say, and in the Fifty-second Congress, the rules of this House permitted this kind of legislation. But in this Congress the majority in its wisdom said, "It is not right thus to consider this kind of legislation;" therefore they put in the rules a provision that we should not do so. The consequence of waiving the rule in the present case is, as members must see, to precipitate a discussion here upon a question on which there has been no full hearing. I know that my friend from Texas, and other members, did have a partial hearing before the Committee on Rules yesterday morning. That committee had before them the attorney, Mr. Hemphill, who, I understand, was before the Committee on the District of Columbia two years ago, when the bill now in question was passed. But this morning, as I have stated, the Committee on the District of Columbia had before them the District Commissioners; they had before them two assistant United States district attorneys; they had before them other attorneys, officers of the District of Columbia—wide-awake and honest—sincerely endeavoring to serve the interests of the District and of the people of the United States. It seems to me we ought to have been allowed to complete that hearing before action is taken by the House. This is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman. I surrender the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], who yielded it to me.

Mr. GROUT. Will some gentleman on the other side now occupy further time?

Mr. MEREDITH. We prefer to wait until somebody else has been heard, if it be agreeable to gentlemen on that side.

Mr. GROUT. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] wish to proceed now?

Mr. DOCKERY. No. I wish to be heard for five minutes at the close of the discussion.

Mr. GROUT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK].

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Chairman, this matter can be determined upon some very simple propositions of law, and I think if they are properly understood this Committee of the Whole can have no hesitancy in voting in favor of this amendment.

The act of 1880 conferred upon the Court of Claims legal and equitable jurisdiction with reference to these claims. The act of 1895, which it is now proposed to repeal, limited the jurisdiction of that court so that in rendering judgment it could not exercise equitable jurisdiction, but must obey the mandates of the statute, thereby accomplishing injustice to the Government through judgments of the court amounting to over $851,000. All this trouble has grown out of the act of 1895. Let me read a part of the language of that act:

> The Court of Claims shall allow the rates established and paid by the board of public works; and whenever said rates have not been allowed, the claimant, or his personal representative, shall be entitled, on motion made within sixty days after the passage of this act, to a new trial in such cases.

Under that provision judgments to the amount of over $800,000 were rendered in conformity to the provisions of the statute, the Court of Claims being forbidden to go into the equities of the case. Parties whose claims had once been determined under the act of 1880 came in there with additional claims and obtained under the act of 1895 judgments which helped to swell this amount of $800,000. When in answer to those claims the attorney representing the Government said, "You are estopped now from coming in and claiming judgment at the hands of this court," the court was obliged to say, "No; our hands are tied." Thus, notwithstanding these claims had been adjudicated before the proper tribunal under the act of 1880, these same parties came into the Court of Claims under the act of 1895 and obtained judgment, in spite of the defense that they had under their written contracts agreed to receive a less amount for their services than they were claiming. In this way these claims, amounting to $800,000, have been recognized, and the present perplexity and trouble have arisen.

Mr. MILNES. Will the gentleman state in what form these men were paid?

Mr. HULICK. They were paid under the act of 1880 in 3.65 bonds.

Mr. MILNES. What were those bonds worth at the time?

Mr. HULICK. That does not make any difference. They entered into their contract under that statute——

Mr. MILNES. The statute did not provide that they should be paid in 3.65 bonds worth 50 cents on the dollar, did it?

Mr. HULICK. The act provided that they should be paid in these 3.65 bonds. Those were the express terms of the statute, which time will not permit me to read.

Mr. PITNEY. It has already been conceded, as I understand, that the value of those 3.65 bonds could not be taken into consideration even under the act of 1895.

Mr. HULICK. No one has made any such claim.

Mr. MILNES. So I understand; yet in equity——

Mr. HULICK. It does not lie in the mouths of these people to talk about equity when they are proceeding under this act of 1895, which says that the Court of Claims shall not inquire into the equity of the claims presented, but must proceed upon the fact simply that these claimants have not been allowed for the difference between the price as fixed in their contracts and the price fixed by resolution of the board; in other words, upon that fact being made evident to the satisfaction of the court, that court must listen to their claims and give them judgment for the difference.

For instance, there was one claim of this kind: A maintaining wall extending some two or three miles was built by a contractor who agreed to do the work for $5 per square yard, or whatever the rate may have been. He was paid the price stipulated in the contract. But after the enactment of this act of 1895, he commences his proceeding in the Court of Claims, and notwithstanding his written contract he obtains judgment for $1.50 in addition to the $5 he had already received under his contract. This is the way the hands of the court were tied, and the way in which those $800,000 of judgments were swelled up.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULICK. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It has been stated that judgments have been rendered under the act of 1895 for the amount of $81,000. That, I believe, is the correct amount.

Mr. DOCKERY. The judgments are $81,000 in round numbers; but there are claims aggregating $851,000, for interest and so on, pending.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Claims already filed?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes.

Mr. HULICK. But, Mr. Chairman, instead of there being that amount rendered as judgments by the court, there would not have been 75 per cent of that amount if it had not been for the passage of the act of 1895, practically compelling the court to render judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULICK. I should like to proceed for a little while longer.

Mr. GROUT. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MEREDITH. I would like to ask the gentleman one question before he proceeds. The case you have referred to has gone up, as I understand it, on appeal on the part of the attorney representing the Government?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEREDITH. And he makes the point that we can not vary from the written terms of the contract. And further, if I understand this matter correctly, he claims that it has not yet been decided as to the constitutionality of the proceedings, which will be inquired into.

Now, let me ask the gentleman if it is his judgment that a law would be constitutional that permits variations in a written contract at the will of either party?

Mr. HULICK. Emphatically no; and I think every lawyer here who has ever given any consideration to the subject would make that same declaration. It is in direct violation of a principle that we all recognize for the Government to undertake to change or vary the terms of a contract after it had been entered into. And this matter has gone up to the court of appeals from a decision rendered by the lower court. But would any gentleman say on that appeal that any court of this country would decide differently from what the District court has already decided? They say that it is imperative that they should decide as they did, and the question goes up on the appeal, not only as to the constitutionality of the law, but as regards the question of interest——

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I understand him to say that judgments have been rendered to the extent of some $800,000?

Mr. HULICK. No, sir; $81,000, I think.

Mr. POWERS. And the indebtedness, if it be an indebtedness, was against the District of Columbia before the act of union in 1878, was it not?

Mr. HULICK. It grew out of a contract that had been determined by the court, and otherwise, between the Government and the claimants themselves, under the provisions of the act of 1895.

Mr. MEREDITH. But the contracts were extended by the Commissioners, and in that way jurisdiction was obtained.

Mr. HULICK. They were extended by the Commissioners of the District, that is true.

Mr. PITNEY. Oh, no; not all of them.

Mr. HULICK. No, not all of them; but a great many were. Those claims that had been incorporated in the judgment were extended by the Commissioners, and under the extension, under the act of 1895, they get the claims taken up, and then they come in and claim a judgment for the difference in money adjudicated and settled the case where the parties had received 3.65 bonds under the act of 1880, and sold the bonds for less than par.

Mr. POWERS. I understand the point the gentleman is making. My inquiry was whether it would not result in landing upon the Government of the United States one-half of an old debt contracted by the District and due from the District before the act of union was passed?

Mr. HULICK. I do not know whether it was one-half or not, but it is a considerable sum. And the claims have not only been "landed," as the gentleman says, if the act remains in force, but hundreds of thousands of dollars more will be involved, as we understood in the hearings before the committee this morning that some $1,400,000 were involved in this question.

Mr. POWERS. And the people of the United States will have to pay one-half of the total amount allowed?

Mr. HULICK. The Government will have to pay its one-half, of course.

Mr. MILNES. What! Out of the 3.65 bonds?

Mr. MEREDITH. If the gentleman will permit me, the citizens of the District have already paid their amount. The property owners have been assessed, and they paid at what are known as "board rates."

Mr. HULICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee says not to repeal this law. We have a resolution before the Committee on the District of Columbia considering this very matter. But let us settle this thing before the adjournment of Congress. It is late now in the session. Let us act now and untie the hands of the court, and if we desire to modify or amend it, giving the court equitable jurisdiction in the premises, that can be done.

This act was passed without the approval of the Commissioners, as they told me no longer ago than this morning. It does not meet their approval, and did not meet it at the time it was enacted, but, on the contrary, it met their entire condemnation. They say that not only the District, but the Government is legally swindled out of a great amount of money if the bill remains on the statute books, and it ought to be repealed at this moment by the House.

I yield back to the gentleman the remainder of the time.

Mr. GROUT. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. GROUT. Will gentlemen on the other side occupy some time now?

Mr. MEREDITH. I yield such time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] as he may desire to occupy.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, it happened to be my good fortune or bad fortune to report this bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia to this House in the Fifty-third Congress. I was simply the mouthpiece of the committee. The bill was under discussion there at several sessions of the committee, and after it had been agreed to—I believe unanimously by the committee—I was instructed to make the report. I made that report.

When that bill came up for consideration in the House I was not present. Circumstances had compelled me to return to my home in Texas, and I was not here during the debate on the passage of that bill. I do not know what took place on the floor of the House, and simply know that I acted on behalf of the committee in making the report.

The report is too long to be read in the short time that I have, but I founded every statement in that report upon a letter from the District Commissioners, which is printed in company with my report. That letter is here. It is signed by John W. Ross, District Commissioner, and addressed to the Hon. John T. Heard, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and dated June 14, 1894.

The report simply reiterates and restates the facts and the legislation of Congress upon the subject of these claims against the Government.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. HULICK. I want to set myself straight. I made the declaration here that this act was enacted without the approval of the Commissioners. Now, the gentleman states that this report was based upon a letter from the Commissioners.

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. HULICK. Approving it?

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. HULICK. Now, one of the Commissioners told me this morning that that was not all of the letter that was written by the Commissioners to the committee, but that a portion of it was left out; or if it was not that letter, it was some letter upon which the committee acted.

Mr. ABBOTT. There may have been another letter.

Mr. SHANNON. That is the Senate report which he refers to.

Mr. ABBOTT. I will simply say that the whole of this letter is printed, the District Commissioners to the contrary notwithstanding. But I will corroborate the gentleman thus far——

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. ABBOTT. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. The point is this, if the gentleman will permit: Since he reported this bill in the Fifty-third Congress, I should like to call his attention to this fact, that the letter of the Commissioners to Mr. Heard, dated June 14, 1894, was in response to a reference by the committee to the Commissioners of House bill 3134, which had been introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH].

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. PITNEY. The Commissioners, in the letter published there, say that they returned a substitute bill containing certain safeguards that the Meredith bill did not contain.

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes, certainly; and I want to say to the gentleman right now that I hold that bill in my hand. He is anticipating me.

Mr. PITNEY. Will you permit me to ask you a question?

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes, but not to make a speech.

Mr. PITNEY. I can not ask my question until I state the facts.

Mr. ABBOTT. I can not yield my time.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well; I will wait until I have my own time, and I hope the gentleman will remain here until the end of the discussion, so that he may be present when I have the floor.

Mr. ABBOTT. Very well. I want to state, Mr. Chairman, that I hold in my hand the substitute bill offered by the Commissioners and the bill which I was instructed to report.

Mr. ABBOTT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported the following bill in lieu of H. R. 7453.

Now, if my friend will give me his attention, that is the bill which the Commissioners brought here.

Mr. PITNEY. No. 7453 was?

Mr. ABBOTT. No. 7453 was. That is the bill that they brought here.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT. And that is the bill they asked us to pass.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; because it contained certain safeguards mentioned in their letter.

Mr. ABBOTT. Well, I have the bill here and will read it for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. PITNEY. Why did not the committee report that bill, instead of reporting another bill which left out every safeguard?

Mr. ABBOTT. I do not concur with you. Now, if the committee will give me their attention, I will read the bill which the Commissioners themselves presented to us, and which they asked us to pass, and then in lieu of that the Committee on the District of Columbia directed me to recommend this bill.

The bill which the Commissioners prepared and requested our committee to pass and to present to this House is as follows:

That in the adjudication of claims heretofore brought under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved the 16th of June, 1880—

I want my friend to listen to the provisions of this bill, so that he will understand the reasons why we reported a different bill—

no sum in excess of the sum named in the written contract allowed by the late board of public works or the late board of audit of said District, and paid to said claimants for work done or materials furnished for said District at the rates established and allowed by said board of public works and known as "board rates"—

I want you gentlemen to listen—and known as "board rates," shall be pleaded or allowed as a set-off or counterclaim against any claim for work done or materials provided for said District so far as the prices allowed and paid were reasonable, just, and equitable. And in all cases where such set-off or counterclaim has been allowed against such claim, in cases heretofore brought as aforesaid, the claimant shall in such cases be entitled to a rehearing of his case.

In the bill we not only provided to cut off these counterclaims, but prevented the board of audit and the Court of Claims from allowing a greater sum than that which had been allowed heretofore. We not only approved the bill, but we thought that under the provision in the District Committee bill they could come in here and before Congress and before the Court of Claims, and although they had been allowed "board rates" they might in addition thereto make claims in addition to the contract price and in addition to the "board rates;" and therefore we did cut that provision out of the bill. We did right; and neither the District Commissioners nor any member of the House can defend the measure the District Commissioners presented to us to pass.

Now, I want, for one, to say that since I have had the honor to be a member of that committee I have not been governed by the District Commissioners. They are not the representatives of the people of this great nation. I have always been willing to hear their suggestions. I have always been willing to listen to their advice, because they are more familiar with the details of this city government than I am; but I have not surrendered to them the right to legislate for this country or the District of Columbia. I do not intend to surrender that right to them. I have never yet passed or voted for a bill in the committee that I did not ask and seek their advice and their counsel, but when I have to surrender the position I occupy as a representative of the people in order to listen to the District Commissioners, and say that I am but the mouthpiece of that concern, I want to repudiate the idea, and I do it here.

I want to say that if you will examine the report which I made in that case, and which is founded absolutely upon the report and upon the letter of Commissioner Ross, you will find I restated the facts substantially as he gave them in that letter. I gave further the history of the legislation upon this subject, showing that in 1871, when the board of public works was created in this District, when this District was given a governor and a legislature—and subsequently the Congress of the United States in its wisdom repealed that form of government for the District and assumed control of it—these contracts had been made by the board of public works with hundreds and hundreds of contractors here who were improving and beautifying the streets of this grand city to an extent which Congress thought was extravagant, and therefore they took their jurisdiction and power away from them and confided it to Congress. These contracts were unexecuted. These contracts which had been made by the board of public works had not been executed at the time of this change in the government of the District of Columbia. What was to be done? Most of these contracts were renewed by the District Commissioners themselves, and many of these contracts were entirely new.

Let me call your attention to another fact—that during the existence of the board of public works the contract system had been altered more than once, and changes in the amount allowed for the improvement upon the streets of this city had been made. These contractors had to comply with the requirements of that board of public works, because they had the contractors directly in their power. Many of these contracts are shown not only by the evidence before the committee, but fully shown in the report which I made, to have been signed in blank. Hundreds and hundreds of these contracts that were made for the improvement of the city were signed by the contractors in blank, and in many cases the clerks never filled out the provision of the contract, but they were turned over under the change of government without any act upon the part of the board of public works or upon the part of anybody else representing the Government or the District of Columbia. The question then came up as to what terms of settlement should be made. Existing contracts were outstanding. There was no measure of damages provided for in the contracts, because they were not existing legal contracts; yet many of these men went on fulfilling the undertakings they had entered into with the board of public works. When the change of government came about, their contracts were not renewed, and the question was, how should the rights of those parties be settled?

Now, the bill which the committee reported and which became a law provided substantially that those contractors should be settled with at the rates which had obtained here under the old régime. The committee modified the bill so as to secure to the parties who had performed services for the District the same compensation which all others had received under the contract system. This is the sum and substance of that bill.

Mr. HULICK. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Would the gentleman insist for a moment that if he had known the interpretation that was going to be given to that act by the Court of Claims he would have reported it?

Mr. ABBOTT. I will say to the gentleman that I would not have reported it. I do not believe that the Court of Claims has given to that law the proper interpretation. I stand on the floor as a lawyer—and I have been one all my life—and say to you, sir, that I do not concur in the judgment of the Court of Claims on that question; but the right of appeal exists, and if the Supreme Court of the United States ever passes upon the question, I predict that it will not uphold the decision of the Court of Claims.

Mr. HULICK. But the gentleman recognizes the principle that as long as that decision stands it is the law?

Mr. ABBOTT. No; because it is appealed from now. It is already suspended by an appeal. Every man has the right to appeal, and as long as that right exists there is nothing settled.

Mr. HULICK. But many of the cases are not in court.

Mr. ABBOTT. Well, if they are not in court, that is their fault, not mine. But to hold that the courts in any civilized land would set aside a written contract, where the parties are bound by the terms of the contract according to every principle of law—to hold that the court would set aside the contract and construe a statute to the benefit or to the detriment of a claimant, is not law and never will be law, and no court of respectability will ever sanction that view.

Mr. HULICK. I think the gentleman is right about that. But when there is a question raised about the meaning of the law, ought not we to make it so plain that there will be no question about the interpretation of it?

Mr. ABBOTT. I will answer my friend in this way: I would not make it plain by such a proceeding as this—by an amendment on an appropriation bill. I would come up like a man and face the question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have unanimous consent that I may occupy fifteen minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I shall not object, provided we can have an understanding that if any gentleman on the other side desires five minutes additional time he shall have it.

Mr. PITNEY. There will be no objection to that.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] both present, and I hope they will do me the honor to remain until I have concluded my remarks.

I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] who has just taken his seat, that I have a very high admiration for his innocence, because, after all his years of life, after all his years of service in this House, after all his experience as a lawyer, he is not able to detect a gross fraud when it is right under his nose. [Laughter.]

The gentleman says the contracts were signed in blank. That is true. The gentleman says they were not signed until some time after the agreements were made. That is true. When were they signed? The work in question was done without the scratch of a pen upon paper; done in violation of a statute which rendered it absolutely unlawful to have work done in that way, and after the work was done and paid for at unlawful and fraudulent rates, when the joint Congressional investigating committee, headed by Senator ALLISON, commenced its investigation of these affairs in the year 1874, they called on "Boss" Shepherd to furnish copies of all these contracts. No such contracts had been made in writing, and the clerks in the departments of the District government were set to work scudding about the District to find these fraudulent jobbers who had fattened off the District treasury, to get them to sign contracts which should show an apparent compliance with the law, years after the work had been fully performed.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PITNEY. Before the gentleman interrupts me, let me give him the evidence of that.

Mr. ABBOTT. I do not require any evidence; I know that to be true.

Mr. PITNEY. I hope you do. If you do not, you have forgotten it, because I have the evidence of it here in a printed report headed by your name.

Mr. ABBOTT. Admitting those facts, I now ask you this question: If this labor was performed without a written contract, although the law required a written contract, are you willing for that reason to deprive men of the quantum meruit that they would be entitled to? Are you willing to deny them justice?

Mr. PITNEY. Everyone of them has had his quantum meruit. They had their legal remedy on their contracts.

Mr. MILNES. What remedy did they have?

Mr. PITNEY. They had a right of action under the original law against the District government, a legal right of action in the Supreme Court. But they were not satisfied with their legal right of action, and the act of 1874 was passed to create a board of audit, and it provided that they should have these same remedies which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MILNES] says they are now claiming. They were not only given these remedies by the act, but they have had them. They have had their suits in court; they have had their judgments; they have had their money.

Mr. MILNES rose.

Mr. PITNEY. I will not yield to an inquiry on the point which the gentleman wishes to bring up—the payment in bonds instead of money—until I get to it. My time is short, and I want to answer the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT].

That gentleman in his own report—Report 1659 of the Fifty-third Congress, third session—shows, I say, his entire innocence of the affairs of this world and his entire ignorance that the unsavory Shepherd régime ever existed in the city of Washington, because he says—I do not know who prepared it for him——

Mr. ABBOTT. I will say to my friend that the report does not show my ignorance on that point; the report does show the existence of "the Shepherd régime." The gentleman, in the statement he now makes, shows his ignorance of what the report contains.

Mr. PITNEY. Not at all——

Mr. ABBOTT. It would so appear, at any rate.

Mr. PITNEY. I am going on to remind the gentleman of what the report contains:

> In a large number of cases where "board rates" were allowed, the modification of the contract was made in writing, in conformity with the statute which required all such contracts to be in writing.

That modification was made after the work was done, and was unlawful—absolutely prohibited by the organic act of 1871. Yet those men have been paid. They have received the "board rates," and are not among the class to be benefited by the act of 1895. But here is what the gentleman was getting at:

> On account of the large number of contracts in existence and the immense proportions of the improvements in progress, all these contracts were not made in due form, and after the work had progressed two or three years Congress, becoming dissatisfied with the extensive outlay of money, proposed an investigation. When this became known, the contract clerks in the office of the board of public works sought out a number of the contractors and had them sign contracts in blank to be filled out at the office at the regular "board rates."

Yes; irrespective of whether that had been the understanding between the parties or not; in spite of the fact that the understanding was contrary to that; in spite of the fact that those men had taken work at prices below the board rates——

Mr. ABBOTT. Does the gentleman deny that the statement he has just read is a correct statement? Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. PITNEY. I am reading the language and explaining it.

Mr. ABBOTT. I ask whether it is not correct?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; and something more is correct. The statement itself discloses the condition of rottenness that now calls peremptorily for the repeal of the act of 1895. It says:

> Through mistake upon the part of the clerks in the said office there were inserted in some of the contracts rates which had prevailed before the "board rates" were finally established in place of the regular "board rates," under which these parties and all others doing similar work were carrying out their contracts, and in accordance with which they had been paid from time to time certain proportions of the amounts due to them.

What does that really show? It shows that the "board rates" were simply fraudulent increases of compensation in violation of law, the rates being increased from time to time without any consideration paid by the contractors, and that the alleged contracts were mere fictions and shams, made out years after the work had been done and the money paid; and the clerks who made out those contracts, for the purpose of dodging a Congressional investigation, could not in their hurry make the fictitious contracts agree with any of the surrounding evidence. The gentleman's report proceeds:

> These contracts were in printed form upon several separate sheets of paper, and were intended to be filled out with the regular "board rates."

This was long after the work was done and paid for.

> As a matter of fact, only the last sheet of these contracts was ever presented to or signed by the contractor, and even this was not done until two years after the contract had actually been made and the work begun, and in some cases after the work was finished.

Yes; and as a matter of fact, not merely was the last sheet only presented to or signed by the contractor, but no sheet at all was ever presented to or signed by any person or officer who had the power under the law to bind the District government.

What is the history of this matter? Let me go over it a little. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]—and I hope he is present——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am present.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman from Tennessee said that he only wanted to provide for just claims. I answer him—and the evidence upon the statute books will sustain me—that there is not a bit of justice, of equity, or of decency in any one of these claims.

Mr. MEREDITH. That statement is contrary to the opinion of the Commissioners.

Mr. PITNEY. It is not contrary to the opinion of the Commissioners.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask my friend to yield a moment. I know that he does not intend——

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining? When I learn that I will decide about yielding.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not prepared to name any claim that is just, but I will state——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. PITNEY. I can not yield unless the gentleman will name some claim that is just.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not prepared to do that, because I do not know the name of a single claimant; but I will say——

Mr. PITNEY. I will yield to the gentleman, if the House will indulge me with a few minutes' extension of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it will do so. The gentleman makes a statement which I think is entirely too broad, because the District Commissioners in their statement this morning conceded that some of these claims might be just. I think that is conceded.

Mr. PITNEY. I did not hear their statement this morning, but I have read the written statement of the Commissioners, dated June 14, 1894, and it does not so show to my mind. Mr. Commissioner Truesdell appeared before the Committee on Rules yesterday and said he had never made that admission.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He has so testified before the committee this morning.

Mr. MEREDITH. He made that admission this morning.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Commissioner Truesdell is simply a public official, acting according to the best of his judgment——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe that.

Mr. PITNEY. And when Mr. Commissioner Truesdell and Mr. Commissioner Ross sent that letter of June 14, 1894, assenting to this more innocent form of bill, they were unaware that the matter had been investigated by committees of Congress and two adverse reports made after full examination and hearing of evidence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to do justice to the Commissioners. I want to say that the Commissioners stated this morning, in direct reply to my question, that while some of these claims might be just, and but for the piling up of the enormous amount of claims, many of which are unjust, the present law might properly be continued in force, yet, in view of all the circumstances, they would not now repeat the recommendation which they made in favor of the passage of any bill giving them relief.

Mr. PITNEY. I was going to say—and I thank the gentleman for his frankness—that the Commissioners now state that so far as they made any recommendation it was based upon a complete misapprehension, and they now recommend the absolute and unconditional repeal of the act of 1895.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. In the opinion of the gentleman from New Jersey, does the existing law provide for the payment of claims that are not just or legal?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes, sir. The law puts an iron rule upon the Court of Claims, and makes it mandatory upon the court to do iniquity. It says that these men shall be allowed "board rates," whether board rates were in contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the agreement and did the work or not.

Mr. BOATNER. You mean to say that it compels the Court of Claims to pay a rate different from the rate fixed in the contract?

Mr. PITNEY. Absolutely so. And I am glad to have the gentleman from Louisiana aroused to the importance and the iniquity of the thing. I am going on to show that every man connected with the matter had his legal remedy, that every man had his equitable remedy, and every man has had his pay according to the terms of the contract, and many of them at rates over and above the contract rates. That occurred in this manner: That in case one man received a higher rate or a different rate from that paid to the others, and was placed on a different footing, then the men who had not been able to get such preferred rates would come in and make a claim for the difference between the amount of compensation they had received and the amount paid to the other contractors, and in many cases these claims were allowed and paid.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the proposed amendment provide a right of suit for whatever may be due to such parties?

Mr. PITNEY. There is nothing due, and I am coming to that point shortly, and hope the gentleman will give me his attention. I trust the committee will pardon me if I have occasion to repeat a little of what I stated on the day before yesterday, when this matter was pending.

The organic act—the original organic act of 1871—expressly provided, by section 15, as follows:

That the legislative assembly shall never grant or authorize extra compensation, fee, or allowance to any public officer, agent, servant, or contractor after service has been rendered or a contract made, nor authorize the payment of any claim or part thereof hereafter created against the District under any contract or agreement made without express authority of law; and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts shall be null and void.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is that the gentleman is reading from?

Mr. PITNEY. I am reading from section 15 of the act of February 21, 1871, the original organic act.

Section 37 of the same act provided for the creation of the board of public works, and provided that said board—

Shall have entire control of, and make all regulations which they shall deem necessary for keeping in repair, the streets, avenues, alleys, and sewers of the city, and all other works which may be intrusted to their charge by the legislative assembly or Congress.

It also declared that—

All contracts made by the said board of public works shall be in writing, and shall be signed by the parties making the same, and a copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the secretary of the District.

And said board of public works shall have no power to make contracts to bind said District to the payment of any sums of money except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and not until such appropriations shall have been made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the legislative assembly of the District of Columbia, under that act, appropriated $4,000,000 for street improvements and other public works, and, in spite of the limitation of the law, the fraudulent contractors and jobbers, in and out of office, went ahead and made improvements for which they claimed $18,872,565.76, or more than $12,000,000 beyond the appropriation of $4,000,000. This had the effect of saddling on the District a debt of $20,000,000, largely for this unlawful work.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman mean to state that an act of Congress has been passed which directed or commanded the Court of Claims to give judgment for those parties at a certain rate, regardless of the amount of the contract?

Mr. PITNEY. Absolutely and unquestionably so. That is the simple case. It is astounding, I know, but it is true, and we are here now seeking to repeal it. I do hope that the committee will be unanimous in its vote upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask an extension of ten minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the extension of time requested by the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEREDITH. I suppose of course there will be an equal extension of time on this side?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly; there will be no objection to that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why were some of the contracts not in writing? Why was it that in violation of the express letter of the law some of these contracts were not in writing? On September 1, 1871, the board of public works advertised for bids, and they got bids for the public works, but did not award a single contract to the lowest bidder; not one. They wiped out all bids at one sitting, and authorized certain favorite contractors to go on and do the work, stating to them—I do not know the words used—"Come around in a few days and we will fix it up under a special contract." And even these very contracts, although in violation of the principle as well as the letter of the law, were held lawful in and of themselves when executed, and the work was performed under them and the money paid.

But next, the contractors wanted compensation over and above the contract rate, on the ground that the board of works had passed a resolution to pay some one in excess of the contract, or had actually paid some other fellow more than they had received for doing the same work; and these claims were allowed, because the claimants established what they called a "customary payment," and hence a "board rate." But in many cases there were no contracts made in writing at all. This was in violation of the law, of course. They went on and did the work, and the board of public works, or some of its members, caused to be entered upon the minute book resolutions raising the price all over the city, irrespective of whether the workmen required it or ought to have it, or whether it was just or not, a sweeping resolution, for instance, "that the price of excavation shall be 30 cents per yard." They raised it again from time to time, and there is not an instance on record where they reduced the rate. But the customary board rate is now claimed, and is held by the Court of Claims, under this mandatory act of 1895, to be the highest rate that was allowed for any similar work.

But how did these resolutions come upon the minutes? I read one of them to the House day before yesterday, and I have now alluded to its substance. The Allison investigation showed that there seldom or never was a legally held meeting of the board of public works, with minutes lawfully entered and approved. The testimony of the clerk who kept the minutes was given before the Allison investigating committee, and he says he simply entered the minutes according to the understanding of members of the board of public works as to what ought to be done. There never was such a honeycomb of iniquity in any city in the Union as that.

Well, but these contractors, having done the work, had a right to sue the District on their contracts, written or oral. If oral, then they were in violation of the law; but even so, after the work was accepted by any lawful authority, they could recover the quantum meruit; that is, what it was reasonably worth. They availed themselves of that. But it was not necessary for them to do so, because during that time the officials were in sympathy with the contractors and paid them not only what their contracts allowed, but paid them more.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who I see is honoring me with his attention, was perhaps not present on the day before yesterday, when I gave that little sample case, out of the numbers that are to be found here in the books, where a man solemnly agreed in writing to do certain grading, including hauling, at 20 cents per cubic yard. Afterwards the board of public works passed a resolution that grading should be paid for at the rate of 30 cents per cubic yard. He went and got the 30 cents, notwithstanding his contract. Afterwards they passed a resolution or established a "custom" that hauling should be paid for at 15 cents a yard.

Mr. PEARSON. Extra?

Mr. PITNEY. They did not say extra, but he collected it extra—15 cents per cubic yard for hauling 30,000 cubic yards. He receipted for this in full June 2, 1873; and more than two years afterwards, after the board of public works had expired, and the work had been done and paid for and receipted for, he came before the board of audit, created under the act of 1874—to which I shall further refer—and claimed and received pay at the rate of 15 cents a cubic yard for the same dirt, because he had dumped his carts and let the dirt fall into the canal at the end of his haul. That man's claim is justified by the act of 1895.

Now, I say that originally these contractors, all of them, had their legal remedy in the supreme court of the District against the District government. But they did not want that. What they wanted was an equitable remedy. The law gave it to them, not only once, but twice. The act of June 20, 1874, was passed creating, by section 6, a board of audit "to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District," including the following:

Fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created, for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works.

That validated every one of those oral contracts, according to the proof by parol evidence, of the agreement actually made.

Fifthly, claims for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by or on behalf of the District of Columbia.

That is, contracts subsequent to the abolishment of the board of public works. The claimants have therefore been given their day before the board of audit for these claims, whether they were in writing, according to the original act, or whether they were oral, in violation of the original act. They have had these claims allowed under that act, every one of them.

But gentlemen say these men were paid in the 3.65 bonds, and that they were worth less than par. Gentlemen of the committee, the act of 1874 was a pure gratuity to these men, and coupled with it was the condition that they should take the pay for these judgments, or the amount ascertained by the board of audit, in the 3.65 bonds. But the very same statute contained this clause:

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

The bonds they took were backed by the credit of the United States Government, and to all intents and purposes were at least as good, if not better, than payment in the legal-tender money of the United States at that time in use.

Under that provision hundreds of these claims—indeed, all of them—were reopened and settled at the equitable price, because it did not restrict the contractors to their legal remedy, and the men went forth from the board of audit with their money or their bonds.

But still they appealed for further relief, and not being satisfied to go into the lawful tribunal, the supreme court of the District, they persuaded Congress to pass the act of 1880, enacting—

That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have original legal and equitable jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia arising out of contracts made by the late board of public works, and extensions thereof made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and such claims as have arisen out of contracts made by the District Commissioners since the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, and of all claims for work done by the order or direction of the said Commissioners and accepted by them for the use, purposes, or benefit of the said District of Columbia, and prior to the 14th day of March, 1876.

This act provided that these judgments of the Court of Claims should be paid in the same 3.65 bonds; but in the meantime the act of 1878 had been passed—the present organic act—whereby the United States Government assumed those bonds and made them as good as gold, so that I have no doubt that in 1880 they sold at par. The act of 1880 was a pure gratuity to these men. Every one of them has availed himself of the benefit of it, for the act of 1895, which we are now proposing to repeal, by its terms applies only to the men who had such claims adjudicated in the Court of Claims under the act of 1880.

Now, complaint is made that we are legislating on an appropriation bill. I undertake to say, gentlemen, that not in one case in a hundred where an act is passed by this House is there one-half so full an understanding of it by members as we have of this proposed amendment at the present time. The gentlemen of the Committee on the District of Columbia seem to be a little touched because the amendment was suggested by members of the Appropriations Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PITNEY. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PITNEY. On the 16th of December, 1896, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] says, a joint resolution to suspend the act of 1895 was sent to the District of Columbia Committee by the District Commissioners, and shortly afterwards they sent to the committee an urgent letter in its favor. An urgent recommendation for the absolute repeal of the act is contained in the latest report of the auditor of the District of Columbia, made, it is true, to the Commissioners, but printed with their report and referred by them to Congress. I should suppose it ought to be examined, and has been examined, by those gentlemen who are in charge of the interests of the District of Columbia as members of that committee.

In the auditor's report for 1896, on page 4, early in the little report, which a man could read in a few minutes, is this language:

I feel constrained to invite your attention to the act of February 13, 1895, providing for the payment to contractors under the late board of public works of the difference between the rates stipulated in their contracts and the schedule of prices afterwards adopted and known as "board rates," which is singularly lacking in precautions for safeguarding the interests of the Government. The Commissioners are familiar with its history, and will doubtless recall their own earnest but unavailing efforts to engraft upon it, while on its way through Congress, such restrictions as, had they been enacted, would have lessened its power for evil and left no occasion for the criticism which I feel impelled by a sense of duty now to make.

In that report, Mr. Chairman, the auditor called attention to two of the most flagrant cases out of all the old "jobs" which have been presented here under the guise of claims. I will print them in the RECORD, without consuming the time of the House to read them.

As justifying this criticism, I mention two cases in point:

During its incumbency the board of public works fixed the price and from time to time apportioned the work to be done among the various contractors of the city instead of letting to the lowest bidder, as the law now requires. On one of these occasions, it is said, a contractor for a certain class of improvements, not satisfied with his allotment, represented that, having a more extensive plant and greatly superior facilities, he could afford to work lower than his competitors, and agreed that if the board, instead of parceling the work among them, would give it all to him in one large contract, he would willingly take less than "board rates." This offer was accepted and the work given to him on his own terms, but years afterwards he set up a claim for the difference between his contract prices and "board rates." The Court of Claims decided against him in 1887, holding as follows:

"The court orders, adjudges, and decrees that the contract between the claimant and the defendant referred to in claimant's petition * * * correctly and truly sets forth the understanding and intention of the parties, and has not by accident, inadvertence, mistake, or clerical error failed to set forth the same, and ought not to be reformed."

In the light of these facts it may seem incredible, and yet it is true, that this contractor now claims the difference between the prices he agreed to take and "board rates," and the referee appointed by the court has recently allowed him $70,272.50, amounting, with interest, to nearly $122,000, because the act of February 13, 1895, requires that in adjudicating claims which were prosecuted under the act of June 16, 1880, the Court of Claims shall allow "board rates."

The second case is that of a contractor who, having completed his work, received a full and final settlement therefor, but years afterwards, averring that the certificates in which he was paid were sold by him at less than their face value, he brought suit under the act of June 16, 1880, to recover the difference. The court held that as the sale was his own voluntary act, he, and not the District, must lose the discount. The question of "board rates" did not enter into the case at all, for the reason that the contractor had received his quittance long before their establishment. Because, however, the act of February 13, 1895, declares that "board rates" shall be allowed to all contractors who sued under the act of June 16, 1880, this contractor now, regardless of the fact that his suit had no relation whatever to those rates, sets up a claim therefor, and has been awarded by the referee $8,664.19, amounting, with interest, to nearly $15,900, and constituting an absolute gratuity for which no justification exists outside the technicalities of this unique statute.

* * * * * * *

When this act was under consideration, Congress was advised that the claimants were few in number, and the amount involved about $70,000, but the docket of the Court of Claims shows 98 petitioners, whose claims aggregate $753,526.75, amounting with interest to $1,300,000. These figures are startling, but they are also official, and bring us face to face with an issue that must soon be met. For myself I do not hesitate to say that the only proper solution of the question is the prompt and unconditional repeal of the law.

But, again, the gentleman says that the Committee on the District of Columbia do not know the circumstances of these claims. Why, I called attention yesterday to the fact that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], a member of the committee, introduced a bill in the Fifty-third Congress in one form and had it referred to the Commissioners, who reported it back with their letter of June 14, 1894, acquiescing, perhaps, in the passage of some bill, but submitting safeguards which were absolutely necessary to protect the public interests. Yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] who recently spoke reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia an entirely different bill, not only taking away all the safeguards, but making it mandatory upon the Court of Claims to do an inequitable thing.

Yet now they say that the matter was entirely unknown to the gentlemen of the Committee on the District of Columbia. How, then, did it happen that the day before yesterday, when my friend the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] moved his amendment, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] was quickly on his feet, before the gentleman from Missouri had given one word of explanation of the purpose of the amendment, to interpose the point of order? He did not do it by accident, or by way of mere precaution, but he did it because the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] had intended to do it, and was temporarily absent. So the gentleman from Tennessee himself explained it, in his remarks subsequently on the same day.

If they did not know anything about the claims, why did they not know something about them after all this time? Is it because they are so busy and so overburdened with work in the Committee on the District of Columbia that they are unable to take up and consider so urgent a case as this?

Mr. MEREDITH. I have been out and have just come in, and did not catch what the gentleman said about "the gentleman from Virginia." Will you please repeat it?

Mr. PITNEY. I said that although the gentlemen of the District of Columbia Committee seem to be unaware of the merits or demerits of the proposition, they were careful to have a point of order opposed against the proposition.

Mr. MEREDITH. I am responsible for the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and do not seek to shirk any responsibility in the matter.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well; I am glad the gentleman has the courage of his convictions.

Mr. MEREDITH. I have that here or elsewhere.

Mr. PITNEY. Now, I have said enough. Gentlemen, it may be I show too much heat upon this question. But it seems to me that this is a matter which ought to arouse a little heat; and I am not going to apologize for the earnest interest I have taken in it. Gentlemen criticise the Committee on Appropriations for the interest they take in such matters, and sneeringly say that we seem to consider ourselves the special guardians of the public Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasant thing for the Committee on Appropriations to do. Do gentlemen suppose that it is any pleasure for us? The gentleman is very much mistaken if he thinks it is a pleasant duty to stand here and have to protest against such things as this.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe we have a little time upon this side, and I would like the gentleman to yield me a minute.

Mr. MEREDITH. I yield the gentleman a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] has made the insinuation, not a direct charge, that I was not frank when I said that I had not heard of this matter until the motion was made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to repeal this bill by this amendment. I stated to the Chair I had not heard of it until a moment before, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] called my attention to it. Now, does the gentleman mean to say that I was not entirely frank in that statement?

Mr. PITNEY. I do not think my language is such as to admit of that construction. I said that the point of order was not made accidentally, by way of general precaution, but was made at the request of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I stated that I had not heard of it until that moment.

Mr. PITNEY. So I stated, on your authority.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the gentleman makes no insinuation to the contrary?

Mr. PITNEY. None at all.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I take the responsibility of making this point of order. I want to deal with the House frankly and honestly, and any criticism that the gentleman from New Jersey has to make upon me I am willing to hear, either in this Hall or elsewhere. I have acted in perfect good faith with the House, and when I stated this morning that the Committee on the District of Columbia was investigating this subject and that I had not known of it until yesterday, I stated the exact fact. I have been perfectly frank with the gentleman from New Jersey and with the House, and any insinuations to the contrary are utterly without foundation.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have made no insinuation of any lack of frankness on the part of the gentleman from Virginia. I have simply given the gentleman credit for the utmost vigilance in attempting to prevent the repeal of this law.

Mr. MEREDITH. And I give the gentleman from New Jersey credit for the utmost vigilance in appearing here, not as a lawmaker, but as an advocate for the repeal of this law.

Mr. PITNEY. For my position in advocacy of that repeal I do not apologize. If I have done anything in this House to be proud of, it is that, and I do not take it back, and I never will. [Applause.]

Mr. MEREDITH. I do not ask the gentleman to take it back. I am proud of the position I have taken in this matter, because I think I am right, and I do the gentleman from New Jersey the justice of believing that he thinks he is right. Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MILNES].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 10th day of February, 1897, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 8886) for the relief of Hiram T. Corum and Silas W. Davis, of Oregon.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2129) granting an increase of pension to Annie E. Nolan.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 1624) to quiet title and possession with respect to certain unconfirmed and located private land claims in the State of Louisiana; and

A bill (S. 361) for the relief of Silas P. Keller.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Chairman, I am in full sympathy with what this amendment is trying to do—that is, to protect the Treasury of the United States of America—but I do believe that this is a contemptible way to do it. I believe that if the Committee on Appropriations had devoted one hundredth part of the time they have occupied upon this floor in discussing this measure to bringing it to the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia, a resolution would have been reported by that committee months ago, and would have passed here by unanimous consent, settling the whole question. Together with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I never heard of this matter until it came up upon this floor. It is true that there was a resolution in our committee providing for the repeal of this law, but, like scores of other resolutions and bills, it never was considered or reached by the committee, because, as every gentleman knows, a great many bills and resolutions are never reached unless they are called up by somebody who desires to have them considered and passed. That is true of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I presume that the same is true of almost every committee in this House.

Now, as to what the gentleman from New Jersey has said with regard to the old board which controlled the District of Columbia previous to 1874, I think he has probably stated the truth. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that much worse things could be said of them than anything the gentleman from New Jersey has said. They were a board that did business outside of the law, but, because the board did that is surely no reason why innocent men who performed work for the District of Columbia should not be paid for their work. I desire now to call attention to a fact——

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. MILNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOATNER. It has been said by the gentleman from New Jersey that if this law be repealed there will still be, as there was before the law was enacted, an ample remedy in the courts of the District for the enforcement of any legal or equitable claims that may exist against the District government. Does the gentleman from Michigan concur in that view?

Mr. MILNES. I will come to that in a moment. These men had the right to go into court on certain contracts said to have been signed by them, but those contracts were signed in blank and the men were working under another provision, made by a resolution of the board of control.

Mr. PITNEY. Does not the gentleman remember that so far as those contracts were signed in blank they were signed years after the work was done, and that the oral contracts were validated by the act of 1874.

Mr. MILNES. I do not know when those contracts were signed; but, as I was saying when interrupted, I know that worse things might have been said of that old board than anything that has been said by the gentleman from New Jersey, because I remember that during the period of their power that board took a hundred men, in the dead of the night, and tore down a public market in the District of Columbia which was occupied by three or four hundred market men, who had paid their ground rent and paid their license fees. I remember that between daylight and dark that building was absolutely pulled down and every dollar's worth of property in it was destroyed. Yea, not only was property destroyed, but two men were killed. All that was done, and yet from that day to this not a single dollar has ever been paid to the men who suffered the destruction of their property, and my friend from New Jersey might say that they, too, had a right to go into court.

But what are the facts as we understand them? As I said a moment ago, I never heard of this case until yesterday. But, although the law required this board to let this work by contract, they went on outside of the law and let it without any contracts. They passed a resolution which declared a certain price for removing dirt; they passed a resolution fixing a price for certain kinds of mason work. Then they went on and employed these men to do this work. Under these resolutions, and without any contract, these men went on in the performance of that work. But when Congress came to investigate the transactions of this board, what then happened? This old board of public works immediately began to "hustle around"—began to place contracts before these men who were doing the work——

Mr. PITNEY. Who had done the work.

Mr. MILNES. Who had done some of the work—not all of it—not even any very great portion of it. But the board said to these men, "We have got into a hole; you must sign these contracts." And they did sign those contracts in blank; and when those contracts were filled out, they were filled out not at the board rates——

Mr. BOATNER. At this point will the gentleman permit a question? Did these contractors, the parties who did the work for the District, have an adequate remedy in any court of the District for the enforcement of whatever rights they may have had?

Mr. MILNES. Yes; under the contracts which they had signed in blank and which had been filled out at rates other than those which they understood they were to receive.

Mr. BOATNER. If they did have an adequate remedy, and if that remedy still exists, what hardship or injustice is done to them by the repeal of a law which directs a decree in their favor for an amount different from what they contracted to receive?

Mr. MILNES. I said that these men went on and did the work under resolutions passed by the board of public works fixing prices—for instance, 30 cents per yard for removing dirt—and without any contract whatever. They were obliged afterwards to come in and sign contracts in blank. And when those contracts were filled out, instead of being filled out at 30 cents per yard for removing dirt, they were filled out at 20 cents per yard.

Mr. HULICK. Is it not true that they not only had the right to go into court originally, but that most of these claimants did go into court and have their rights adjudicated, and that their claims were paid out in bonds, as provided by the statute of 1880?

Mr. MILNES. Paid at the rate which appeared in contracts which they had signed in blank and which were filled out at a different figure from that at which they undertook to do the work.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman is mistaken about that entirely.

Mr. MILNES. That is the information which the committee got this morning.

Mr. HULICK. Is it not true that the parties did go into court and have their rights adjudicated, and that now the act of 1895, which is sought to be repealed——

Mr. MILNES. I can not yield for so long a question. The gentleman has had his own time.

Mr. BOATNER. I am asking my question for information.

Mr. MILNES. I say to the gentleman from Louisiana that these parties did have the right to go into court, and that some of them did so; but, as I understand from information which we received this morning in committee, they were held strictly to the written contracts which had been signed by them in blank.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman state that those contracts were filled up for less amounts than those at which the work had been undertaken?

Mr. MILNES. That is the information of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Whether that be true or not I do not know; but that is the information that we were allowed to get in the short time that we were permitted to investigate the question this morning. We have had only a couple of hours to investigate the whole question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was settlement made, so far as made at all, upon the basis of the contract figure?

Mr. MILNES. At the contract figure in those contracts which were signed in blank.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then are not the parties estopped from repudiating the figure stipulated in the contract, unless they repudiate the contract altogether?

Mr. MILNES. That would have been so if this act had not been passed by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have the right to collect damages upon the quantum meruit.

Mr. MILNES. They have a right under existing law to go before the Court of Claims and collect the difference between the price named in the written contract and the price fixed by the resolution of the board of public works.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then is not the court the proper place for them?

Mr. MILNES. Certainly it is. But it is now proposed to repeal that law. That is what we are fighting over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have had their day in court.

Mr. MILNES. It is proposed here by an amendment to an appropriation bill to repeal the law allowing them to recover this difference. This amendment not only attempts to repeal the existing law on this subject, but it goes further and says:

> And no judgments heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid.

It proposes not only to repeal the law and say you shall not go before the Court of Claims any more, but it goes even further than that and says that any judgment heretofore rendered by the Court of Claims shall not be paid, no matter how just the claim may be.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, of the enormity of the amount of the claims involved. But I contend, sir, here, that if a claim is a just one, if the Government owes the claimant, if the debt is justly due, no matter how much the amount, it makes no shade of difference. The principle established by the House is simply this: Is the claim just and proper? Does the Government owe the man a certain sum? If it does owe him, it should be paid, just as any honest man would pay his own individual debts.

Again, the claims are not so enormous as the gentleman from New Jersey would leave us to understand. It is true that about $800,000 in round figures have been presented. Over $400,000 of these have been adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and out of that $400,000 more than four-fifths have been rejected and dismissed by the court, leaving only about $80,000 allowed. Of the $400,000 now before the court, as stated by the attorneys of the United States before the Committee of the District of Columbia to-day, a very large proportion is for the difference in the price of the bonds in which the contractors were paid and the prices at which they were compelled to be sold—that is, the difference between their selling price and their par value. But the courts have decided this question, that that can not be taken into consideration, and that dismisses a large amount of the pending claims.

Under the law as it stands, I am opposed to it; and, if I could do nothing better, I would vote for the entire repeal of the law. But in my judgment it should not be repealed in this way. In my judgment it should be amended, and with such safeguards thrown around it as will protect the United States of America and do justice to every individual citizen.

Mr. MEREDITH. Will the gentleman from Vermont proceed now to consume the remainder of his time?

Mr. GROUT. We propose to close the debate on this side. If the gentlemen wish to occupy further time, I hope they will proceed now.

Mr. MEREDITH. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT].

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would not rise to address the committee again but for the fact that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], when occupying the floor a few moments ago, saw proper to accuse the District Committee, and myself especially, of being extremely innocent and entirely ignorant in regard to the affairs of the District and the affairs of the country as involved in the pending proposition. Of course I regard such charges as they should be regarded, coming from the source they do. I hurl back to the gentleman the statement that his stupidity is so intense that he can not comprehend or understand the report I made in this case. He took it for granted that I was relating in the report I made to this Congress my views of the controversy, when I was simply stating the facts—simply reiterating that which had been stated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. He took it for granted, as he could not discriminate between the recitation of the facts and my own position, that I was giving in the report my own views.

I want to say to the committee and to the gentleman that I was not responsible for the legislation which gave rise to these claims. I was not then a member of Congress. I was not responsible for any of that legislation; and the gentleman attributed to me ignorance because I simply recited the facts of the legislation that had been had in the past.

He recites facts for which, and I do not make the assertion in any offensive sense, his party was responsible and not mine. I was not responsible, I repeat, for any of this legislation that led to the causes which gave rise to these claims, and these claims, whether they are just or unjust, do not present a question for me to pass upon.

On the strength of the report of the District Commissioners, the committee—not I, but the committee—substituted a bill which resulted in the legislation of 1895, and I was requested by the chairman to make the report. That is my whole connection with the matter; and the stupidity of the gentleman from New Jersey could not comprehend the position I occupied as a mere member of the committee, reporting the action of the committee upon the proposition, and not undertaking in any way to state my own views upon it, which has induced him to assert that I was acting from innocence or ignorance of the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEREDITH. I will yield to the gentleman another minute.

Mr. ABBOTT. Clear out your own mind; remove the clouds that hover over your own mind like a pall; clear them away and let the bright sunshine of God Almighty enter that brain once, and I will be satisfied.

Mr. MEREDITH. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McEWAN].

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the pending resolution by striking out the words in the next to the last paragraph, as follows:

And no judgment heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Chairman, conceding all that has been said about the iniquity of these claims, I yet say that the most important part of this discussion has not been referred to at all. To allow these words to remain in this resolution is to make a conflict between the legislative and the judicial branches of this Government. The amount involved is but $70,000, as I am told; only that amount has gone to judgment; and it seems to me that we might very well strike out those words in order to avoid starting on a road that will ultimately bring the legislative branch into conflict with the judicial. There is no justification whatever for doing this. It will end in allowing the legislative branch to coerce the judiciary. From the foundation of the Government to the present time I know of no action in any legislative body such as that which is sought to be accomplished here. The proper way, probably, is to pass this entire resolution with the exception of those words. I expected that some of the great constitutional lawyers of this body would dwell upon the importance of striking out these words. I do beseech you all not to start upon this path. Think well before you make this conflict between coordinate branches of the Government.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will recall the history of the case, he will remember that there is no conflict between the legislative and judicial branches of the Government. The same Court of Claims has given its decree that there is neither law nor justice nor equity in these claims. That court would not have given a different decree if Congress had not arbitrarily commanded them to do injustice. Now, we ought to wipe out the whole thing.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Chairman, I not care to discuss any branch of this matter at all except the one that here is a conflict between the legislative and the judicial officers of this Government, and that should not be. I see a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect shaking his head, but I tell you this is the beginning of the time when the legislature can coerce the judiciary. We ought to have those words stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEREDITH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more time.

Mr. McEWAN. I have said all that I want to say. I merely want to urge the point that this is very dangerous legislation, and I want to go on record as protesting against it.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], who has talked about my connection with this case, that I assume the responsibility. I made the objection to the amendment which was offered, and if the gentleman is proud of his position, I am also proud of the position that I have taken here, because I believe that I am right; and I want to say to the gentleman—who I see is throwing kisses at me now, so that I can not say what I intended to say—that I consider that the committee to which I belong have acted in good faith, and with as much honesty and as much sincerity as the committee to which the gentleman belongs, who has, I must say in conclusion, appeared here as the advocate and not as the lawmaker, in my judgment.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I have had some knowledge of these claims for the last twelve years. I was assigned to duty on the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Forty-ninth Congress, and served on that committee through that Congress, the Fiftieth, and the Fifty-first. In the Fifty-first I had the honor to be chairman of that committee. In the Forty-ninth Congress these claims were presented. They reappeared in the Fiftieth Congress and in the Fifty-first. The District Committee of the Fifty-first Congress took especial pains to investigate these claims. I presume they had been before the committee prior to the Forty-ninth Congress, but there had been no report by the committee before the Fifty-first.

There is a subcommittee of that committee known as the judiciary subcommittee, which is ordinarily composed of the chairman and one Republican and one Democrat. Mr. THEODORE E. BURTON, the gentleman who then represented the Cleveland district of Ohio, and who now represents that district—and I am sorry he is not present—was the Republican member of that subcommittee with the chairman. These claims went to that subcommittee, and it was decided, after a thorough investigation, to report against them. It seems by the letter of the auditor, dated May 29, 1892, that as early as January 16, 1890, he was called upon by that subcommittee for information concerning these claims, which was furnished by the Commissioners. But not being satisfied with that report, there being only a rough estimate of the total amount, on the 9th day of January, 1891, the Commissioners were called upon by that committee for a specific statement of the names of the persons and companies with which the contracts were made and the amount claimed by each.

The auditor furnished a statement to the committee, under date of January 9, returning the reply on the same day. In that he made an estimate of $57,070 as the amount called for by all claimants, giving a list of their names, which I will not stop to read. But it seems this was not all that the committee had heard of. The committee in their report, written by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], which is printed in the volume of Reports of the House of Representatives for the second session of the Fifty-first Congress, say that other claims still have come to their knowledge. I remember the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Fifty-first Congress were satisfied that the District office did not have full information as to the number of claimants nor the amount claimed. We, at all events, decided to report against them, and determined to present the matter fully and exhaustively to the House.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] was authorized to draw the report. In doing so, he recited by name the different claimants named in the bill. There were eight of them in that bill, but it seems from the report that there were outside a large number asking for a general bill, so that they might be included also. All the claims named in the bill are carefully reviewed in the report. One was in favor of Andrew Gleeson. He was the first in the list. I can not stop to read the full report, but his claim was found by the committee to be utterly without equity or justice. Nevertheless, I find in the list of judgments already rendered under the law which this amendment proposes to repeal, one in favor of Andrew Gleeson for $7,695.

I will ask at the close of my remarks to have this report printed in full; and will now stop to read from it only here and there a sentence. In that report in the Fifty-first Congress the committee said:

The second claim, that of Peter P. Little, administrator of Michael Shiner, against the District of Columbia, seems to us to have no possible basis of equity.

That report shows that it had been rejected by the Court of Claims; and this was the language used by Chief Justice Drake in delivering the opinion:

We are not able to discover any foundation for such a claim. Every fact in the case is against it. The grading was all done before claimant's contracts were canceled, and at a time when there was not the least ground for claiming it to have been done under any other contracts.

The order of January 22, 1872, increasing the rates for grading, was not retrospective in its operation; did not refer to contracts previously entered into on other rates; did not mention Shiner or his contracts.

As I say, the Court of Claims had rejected this claim in the foregoing very strong language, and yet I see in this list of judgments already rendered Peter Little is allowed $1,275.80 under the provision in the law of 1895 directing the court to allow the board rates.

I also find in this report of the District Committee in the Fifty-first Congress a description of the claims of Owen O'Hara, Frank H. Finley, William Schooler, John J. Shipman, and of one Lipscomb, whose Christian name does not appear in the report, and on turning to the list of claimants now before the Court of Claims under this law I find all these names pushing in that court for this arbitrary allowance of 30 cents per yard, though their contract was to do the work for 20 cents per yard.

Mr. Chairman, let it be remembered that these men have all once had their day in court; all had a chance to establish their claims and recover every cent they were entitled to under their contracts. This was expressly so declared in Gleeson's case by Chief Justice Drake, and the others are precisely like this one.

But now, under this law of 1895, directing the court to allow 30 cents a yard for grading, these men reappear before the Court of Claims, and two of them have actually obtained judgments for considerable sums.

Now, let me refer for a moment to three certain letters of the auditor. There is in his last letter, the one of May, 1892, a revision of his former statements as to number of claimants and amount claimed. He says those statements were made upon the authority of a trusted clerk in his office of the name of Donovan,

I think; that he trusted implicitly on him for the information, he having been long familiar with them. But in this letter of May, 1892, to the Senate committee, he says he wishes entirely to recall those former statements as not being correct. Those former letters were the ones he sent the District Committee in the Fifty-first Congress. In this letter of the auditor in 1892 he refers to the Burton report as an exhaustive presentation of the matter, and Mr. MCMILLAN, in reporting against these claims in the Senate in the Fifty-second Congress, incorporates the Burton report into his as the substantial ground for disallowing them.

Mr. Chairman, I said at the outset that I would not be in favor of repealing an act of Congress upon an appropriation bill if I were not entirely satisfied that the act ought never to have been passed in the first place. In this case the act certainly never ought to have been passed. Another point, Mr. Chairman, is that it was not fully considered by the House when it was passed. It went through in one of those peaceful, but active hours when the courtesy of unanimous consent prevails and all are happy but those who fail of recognition. We are told that "Senatorial courtesy" exists at the other end of the Capitol, and when "unanimous consents" are on in this Hall, Representative courtesy prevails here, and we do not generally inquire very carefully as to the merits of the measures presented. It seems that in this case the gentleman from Texas, Governor SAYERS, thought there might be something amiss in the bill and inquired about it, but was quieted by the replies he received. The bill was passed in my absence. If I had been present, I am quite certain that I should have recognized these old claims which the District Committee in the Fifty-first Congress had tried to bury, and supposed they had buried beyond resurrection. I feel sure if I had been present, I should have recognized these old acquaintances, though it is true no names were given in the bill of 1895.

Mr. Chairman, it is said that the District Commissioners recommended the bill that became a law in 1895. I have been allowed to see a copy of the bill which they did approve and their letter of recommendation sent to the committee in the Fifty-third Congress. In that letter the Commissioners do not expressly recommend any bill. They say they send a draft of a bill, and that if it is passed these claims can be settled, and that no appropriation to pay them will be necessary, because they will settle themselves by certain offsets that should be allowed against them, which I have no time to describe in full.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON. I understand you to say now that in your opinion the bill which passed the Fifty-third Congress, and under which suits were brought and judgments obtained in the Court of Claims, was an absolute fraud upon the Congress of the country.

Mr. GROUT. No; I do not mean to say that anybody intended to practice fraud. The District Committee has a world of work to perform, as I know from my own experience as a member of it.

The members of that committee can not examine every proposition as fully as they would desire. I am not imputing any dishonorable motives or acts to the District Committee, but it was evidently a mistake for them to report that bill. To-day I asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] who reported the bill whether he would have reported it if he had had knowledge of the report of the District Committee in the Fifty-first Congress, and he said frankly he would not. Why, Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen of the committee had had that report before them, I know they would never have reported the bill that it is now proposed to repeal. I am sure they would not, for it would have set them to looking into the matter, and I believe investigation would have decided them against it.

Mr. WATSON. Another question. Suppose, now, that under that law which was passed by the Fifty-third Congress some man went into court and obtained a judgment, a meritorious one——

Mr. GROUT (interposing). I do not think any of them were meritorious—not intrinsically meritorious—but of course, under the law of 1895, they had at least a legal standing.

Mr. PITNEY. All the meritorious claims had been adjudicated before and paid.

Mr. GROUT. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the light of the full history of these claims there is not a meritorious one among them; not one. It has been said the Commissioners recommended them as proper to be allowed. That claim is fully disposed of by the Commissioners in their letter to the Senate, dated February 4, 1893, upon which Senator FAULKNER'S report was made, and which has been seen here on the floor by certain members. They say in that letter:

> With reference to your inquiry whether, in the judgment of the Commissioners, the proposed legislation should be enacted, the Commissioners have to state that if the equities are considered some careful remedial legislation might be proper. At law the claimants have had their day in court and been defeated.

That is the strongest recommendation of the Commissioners that I have been able to find. And everbody knows that it will never answer to go back and dig up stale claims which have either been adjudicated or at least have had opportunity for adjudication, and then talk about the equities of such a proceeding.

Mr. WATSON. Now, let me finish my question.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. When interrupted, I was about to put this question: Suppose that under the act passed by the Fifty-third Congress judgments had been obtained, meritorious ones; does the gentleman think that we now ought to provide in this bill that those judgments shall not be paid?

Mr. GROUT. If they were really meritorious judgments, of course not; but the trouble is they are not meritorious judgments——

Mr. WATSON. One other question. There is a large number——

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman let me answer his question?

Mr. WATSON. You have answered it.

Mr. GROUT. No, sir.

Mr. WATSON. You have answered it satisfactorily to me.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I deny that a single meritorious judgment has been rendered under this act. If you take the act as a just and proper one, some of the judgments rendered under it might be considered as meritorious under the act. The trouble is not so much with the judgments as with the act under which they are rendered. These claimants all had their day in court, all had an opportunity to appear and present their claims to the Court of Claims and to the board of audit and to have every equitable right there considered, and they failed to present them, or, when they were presented, the decision was against them. Then they got a law passed—the law of 1895—which gave them a right of action where they had no right before. Now, who can fairly talk about a meritorious judgment under such a law? Both the law and the judgment are tainted with injustice—injustice to the people who have to pay judgments that had no cause of action on which to rest until one was created by statute twenty-four years after any just and meritorious cause of action could have accrued.

Mr. BOATNER. Does this amendment propose to invalidate judgments already rendered by the Court of Claims?

A MEMBER. As I understand it, it does; and says, practically, we will not pay any of the judgments that have been rendered under it.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me say to the gentleman it does not. It simply vacates pending proceedings, recognizing the distinction between a proceeding and a judgment.

A MEMBER. Is not that the same thing?

Mr. BAILEY. It may have the same effect practically, but Congress has no power to invalidate a judgment of a court.

Mr. BOATNER. My next question is this: Is it the opinion of the gentleman that we can lawfully and rightfully destroy the legal effect of any judgment which has been rendered in accordance with law?

Mr. MEREDITH. This amendment undertakes to do that.

Mr. GROUT. If the amendment is unconstitutional, the court will, of course, have authority to set aside the act to the extent of its interference with the judgments. The repeal of this law would not in strict terms invalidate the judgment, but it would provide authority for refusing to appropriate the public money in payment of it. There has already been $63,000 paid on these claims, and I think it high time further payment should be stopped. Sixty-three thousand dollars already paid, and how much lies beyond no man can tell. The auditor in his letter of 1892 to the Commissioners, to be sent to the Senate committee, said very prudently that he would not undertake to venture upon that field of wild conjecture. He had trusted his accountant and clerk to do so and had twice confidingly signed estimates which he found utterly unreliable and which he then recalled, saying, "No one knows what it will amount to." He then made a personal examination of these claims and became satisfied that they had no merit and ought not to be paid, as expressly stated in that letter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to close the debate.

Mr. BOATNER. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I trust he will answer this question, which I am asking for information, because I want to understand what the real effect of this proposed legislation is. Is it proposed by this legislation to deny to parties who have obtained judgments under the law the remedies which that law gave them? In other words, does this amendment propose to operate retroactively and to invalidate judgments which have been rendered in accordance with the provisions of existing law?

Mr. GROUT. I have already answered the gentleman as fully as I can. I call for the reading of the amendment, which will best explain the matter. That will show that we do not propose to make any further payments on the judgments rendered under that law.

The Clerk read as follows:

> That the act approved February 13, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes,' approved June 16, 1880," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

And all proceedings pending shall be vacated, and no judgment heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, this question has been so thoroughly and ably discussed that I do not propose to detain the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. MEREDITH. Before the gentleman from Missouri proceeds further, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] be allowed to occupy the floor for two or three minutes.

Objection was made.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that this matter has been so fully discussed that I am persuaded the House is in possession of all the material facts, and therefore I shall not detain members by any extended remarks. After all, this is a very simple proposition. I am not a lawyer, but I think I can comprehend the issue. Certain contractors under the board of public works in 1874 agreed to do certain work for the city of Washington. They entered into contracts in writing; they performed the work, and they were paid in full pursuant to the terms of their contracts. Subsequently the board of public works provided that contractors should be allowed what were called "board rates," notwithstanding they had entered into contracts in writing with the city to perform the service at lower rates.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, the effect of the act of the last Congress was to give to these contractors a sum estimated at $1,400,000, being the difference between the contract price and the "board rates." The contractors had contracted with the city at certain rates. The "board rates," as a pure gratuity, gave to these contractors, in most cases, higher rates. The law which the present amendment seeks to repeal allows the Court of Claims no discretion. The language of the act of February 13, 1895, is mandatory, and compels the court to allow the contractors "board rates;" and in doing this it involves the city, as heretofore stated, in an additional liability estimated at about $1,400,000.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman state, if he knows, in what way the board was influenced to do that? What information has the gentleman on that subject?

Mr. DOCKERY. My information is a matter of history. Corruption was rampant here at that time; scandals were prevalent. A Congressional investigation developed the fact that improper influences in the main secured the allowance of "board rates," and substantially the entire administration of the city was tainted with suspicion.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield a moment? Admitting all that has been said—that these judgments did not represent any real indebtedness—where does the gentleman find any authority to invalidate by an act of Congress judgments which have been rendered by a competent court, pursuant to law, and which have passed into the domain of property? How can we declare that the District of Columbia shall not pay those judgments without directing and commanding the District to commit an act of repudiation?

Mr. DOCKERY. In answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, from the standpoint of a layman, not being learned in the law, that by this amendment we propose not only to repeal the law, but forbid the payment of judgments, because they were obtained under a mandatory statute which, in effect at least, is fraudulent.

If it is right—and I may say if it is equitable—to pay the judgments, then all the claims that are pending should, in equity and fair dealing, be paid.

Mr. BOATNER. It is not a question of equity, but a question of absolute legal right.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, the gentleman must discuss that issue with the lawyers. I speak now only from the standpoint of a layman.

Mr. ABBOTT. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. ABBOTT. I ask the gentleman—he says this is a mandatory law—on what does he base that opinion? I say to him that every case that has been passed upon by the Court of Claims is now under appeal.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the language of the law is absolutely mandatory.

Mr. ABBOTT. It has not been passed upon.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, there is not a meritorious case pending before the court, and there could not be, because the claims in every instance are based on the difference between the contract price and "board rates." The contractors entered into an agreement with the District to perform the service at certain rates, and there can be no justice in permitting them to go before the Court of Claims and secure additional compensation over and above the contract price.

Mr. MILNES. I am amazed at the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri in regard to these claims.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MILNES. I would ask the gentleman this question: Does he make the statement that if these claims, or judgments, are paid, then that all claims now pending of this character should be paid? Does not the gentleman know that four-fifths of the claims that the court acted upon were rejected?

Mr. STEELE. Then they are not pending.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know it. I am advised by a statement of the auditor of the District, which I will incorporate at this point in my remarks——

Mr. MILNES. The attorney of the District said it was so.

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). I am advised that on January 11, 1897, there were pending $851,844.53 of claims, exclusive of the interest claimed upon these amounts. So that if the claims are allowed—the court is compelled to allow board rates under the act of February 13, 1895—the interest and principal combined will swell the aggregate to about $1,400,000.

I insert at this point a complete tabular exhibit of these claims, prepared by Auditor Petty:

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, let me say that I do not care whether the amount involved is fourteen hundred thousand dollars or $10,000. There is no equity, there is no justice, and no fair dealing in allowing any of these unworthy claims, and the House ought to support the amendment which repeals the law and prohibits further payment of judgments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired under the order of the committee, and the question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCEWAN], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words, "and no judgment heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid."

Mr. PITNEY. That amendment should be voted down by the committee, if we are to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 11, after line 2, the following:

"That the act approved February 13, 1895, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and all proceedings pending shall be vacated and no judgment heretofore rendered in pursuance of said act shall be paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, when we passed the preceding paragraph I asked the privilege of returning to it, and I will do so now, for the purpose of offering a substitute for the provision incorporated in the bill at that point.

I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, commencing with line 22, up to and including line 25, on page 10, and insert:

"To enable the Commissioners to have the numerical books for the city of Washington and county photolithographed, $1,986, to be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read as follows:

For work on streets and avenues named in Appendix "Bb," Book of Estimates, 1898, $100,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Commissioners upon streets and avenues specified in the schedules named in said appendix and in the aggregate for each schedule as stated herein, namely:

Georgetown schedule: Nine thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 15 and 16, page 12, the words "nine thousand one hundred and sixty-six" and insert "forty thousand five hundred."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make it conform more nearly to the estimates of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The Commissioners have certified to the House thirteen different streets for improvement in the old city of Georgetown, and have asked $55,000 for the purpose of making these improvements. I have offered an amendment which provides only $40,500, which is exactly the amount this bill provides on page 16 for the improvement of three streets only, in the country. Those three streets in the country will accommodate perhaps 500 people, not more than that, and in the city of Georgetown, which, according to this bill, is to receive only $9,000 in appropriations for this purpose, there are some 10,000 inhabitants. More than this, the amount given in the bill, $9,166, can not be made up in any way from the schedule submitted by the Commissioners. It is not the amount necessary to improve one street, two streets, three streets, or any other number of streets, and the same remark applies to all the other schedules mentioned on this page. For instance, in the northwest section the Commissioners estimate for four items, aggregating $170,500; in the southwest section they estimate for sixteen items, aggregating $82,000; in the southeast section for twenty items, aggregating $130,000, and in the northeast section for eighteen items, aggregating $155,400. In all of these cases little more than one-tenth of the amount which the Commissioners have asked for is granted by this bill, an amount which is entirely inadequate.

The whole amount as provided in this bill is not one-third of the amount carried by the bill last year. In fact these items are so meager that the whole appropriation might as well be omitted as to grant these miserable small items. Then, again, there are two provisions on this page and the following page providing how this money shall be expended. The first one, in lines 12 and 13, says that it is—

To be expended in the discretion of the Commissioners upon streets and avenues specified in the schedules named in said appendix and in the aggregate for each schedule as stated herein, namely.

Mark you, to be expended in the discretion of the Commissioners. But there is a proviso at the bottom of the page covering every one of these proposed appropriations, which says:

Provided, That the streets and avenues shall be contracted for in the order in which they appear in said schedules, and be completed in such order as nearly as practicable.

Now, it is impossible for the Commissioners to use the discretion which is granted to them at the top of this page and still be bound by the requirements of the bill itself, if they have any discretion at all.

Then, again, as I have said, these items that are proposed to be appropriated for are such items that it is impossible to complete any one of the works for which the Commissioners have asked an appropriation. The whole amount is entirely inadequate. As I said, it is only about one-third of the amount carried by the last appropriation bill. It is entirely unsatisfactory to the people of the District of Columbia, and is in marked contrast with the appropriation to which I call the attention of the committee in relation to three streets up in the northwest section, where the entire property is owned by about three people, or very few owners at least; while in the city of Georgetown some 10,000 people will be benefited, as against a few dozen in the other section.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I have only a word to say in reference to this matter. The Commissioners estimated $600,000 for improvements and repairs of streets. The committee thought they could allow but $100,000, and they have apportioned pro rata to these different schedules, the Georgetown schedule, the northwest section schedule, the southwest section schedule, the southeast section schedule, and the northeast section schedule, according to the sums estimated for those schedules respectively by the Commissioners. As to the discretion of the Commissioners, I will say there is a list of streets prepared in the order of their importance, that list having been submitted by the Commissioners. This money is to be expended on the streets in the order given in the list as nearly as practicable.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. How can you justify the appropriation, on page 16, of $40,500 for the improvement of three streets, and grant only $9,000 for the improvement of all the streets in the city of Georgetown?

Mr. GROUT. What streets does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I refer to the following items, to be found at the top of page 16:

For paving Connecticut avenue and Columbia road between Florida avenue and Eighteenth street extended, $36,000: Provided, That the owners thereof shall dedicate the spaces for widening said Columbia road within the limits named, for conformity with the recorded plans of highway extensions;

For grading, regulating, and paving Roanoke street from Thirteenth street to Fourteenth street, $4,500; in all, $40,500.

Mr. GROUT. Well, that is new work, Mr. Chairman, and it necessarily requires much money to complete it. The amount allowed is less than the estimate, as I remember it, or certainly not more. It was thought by the committee that the work on these streets could be entered upon. The amount which the gentleman refers to is simply for improvements and repairs. That is all. A very different thing from building new streets.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. A very different thing, Mr. Chairman; but, notwithstanding all that, there are twenty streets in Georgetown unimproved to one on the Hill, on which this $40,500 is to be expended.

Mr. GROUT. I did not yield for a speech. The gentleman has time in which to submit his remarks.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the proviso in line 25 of page 12, in connection with the four preceding paragraphs, for instance, "northeast section schedule, $25,900." The proviso reads:

Provided, That the streets and avenues shall be contracted for in the order in which they appear in said schedules, and be completed in such order as nearly as practicable.

Referring to that schedule, I find in the northeast section a list of some twenty or more streets for which there are estimates; but the two streets first named require an appropriation amounting to $32,000, and here is a total of appropriations provided of $25,900, not a sufficient sum to provide for the work of two of those streets. Now, at that rate, if this proviso is to be continued, and if this method is to be continued, it will be at least six years before the last street already in the schedule of the Commissioners can receive attention. I submit that that is not a wise provision in the bill.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that hereafter we hope to be able to appropriate larger sums for the improvement and repair of streets. This is all the committee could carve out of the revenues for this bill, and with the increased speed with which, it is hoped, we may hereafter provide for these streets, the streets the gentleman has in mind may be reached inside of six years. I hope that they will be, as I believe they ought to be.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. What reason exists now why there can not be more than one-third of the amount appropriated last year in regard to this matter?

Mr. GROUT. I think this is about the same sum the committee brought into the House last year. Wait till we are through with the Senate.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is all very true; and I hope that when we get through the Senate we will get back to the old figures.

Mr. GROUT. Just a word, so that there may not be a misunderstanding about the provision for the improvement of streets. In my opening remarks upon this bill I called attention to the large expenditure for sewers—amounting to almost three-quarters of a million of dollars. Everything which it seems necessary to be done in this city can not be done in a single bill. The committee have thought it better to make ample provision for the sewers, which looked to the health of the city, and that if anything must suffer it better be streets; and proceeding upon that principle, they reduced considerably, as you have seen, the estimates of the Commissioners in regard to street improvements and repairs.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the total amount estimated for by the Commissioners in Georgetown and the four sections?

Mr. GROUT. For the four sections they call for $600,000, and for Georgetown $55,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. So they estimate for half a million?

Mr. GROUT. More than half a million; $600,000 for street improvements in the four sections.

Mr. HENDERSON. The committee felt that all they could do in the present condition of the revenues was to give $100,000?

Mr. GROUT. We think we have done the best we could, under all the circumstances, for repair of streets. We were asked to enter upon many new projects, but selected only two—the two said by the Commissioners to be the most urgent.

Mr. HENDERSON. One further question, if the chairman has it in mind. What are the estimated revenues for the District for the next fiscal year? You may have stated it in your report; and what amount is covered and carried in this bill?

Mr. GROUT. The total estimated revenues for the year 1898 is $3,359,858.33. The total amount carried by this bill is $5,642,856.93, one-half to come out of the District revenues——

Mr. HENDERSON. Making $2,500,000 or $3,000,000 less than the estimated revenues?

Mr. GROUT. A little over $500,000 will be left in the District revenues by this bill as it stands now——

Mr. HENDERSON. Leaving half a million for the Senate?

Mr. GROUT. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON. It strikes me the committee are acting with wisdom in the matter, from our experience in the past.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Can the gentleman tell us how far that is changed from preceding years?

Mr. GROUT. What?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The revenues. Are they less or more; and if so, how much?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GROUT. This whole subject is presented on page 43 of the bill. The revenues for 1897 were $3,225,081.56, about $100,000 less than for 1898.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And, Mr. Chairman, these estimated revenues show an annual increase. For 1895 they were $3,469,740.51; for 1896 they were $3,061,688.96; for 1897, $3,225,081.56, and for 1898, $3,359,858.33. So that they go on increasing each year; and as the United States duplicates these almost entirely, in the face of that the committee come in here with a meager appropriation of $100,000 for all the streets inside of the city and for one-half of them, for a little bit of a section, just outside of the city, where some favored people happen to own property.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman wants to make good that statement, of course, and he will have an opportunity to do so before the bill is concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to strike out the last word, and I desire to say briefly, in reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, that while the people outside of the boundary have been heavy taxpayers for many years and have never yet had their proportionate share of the appropriations for improvements, I am glad that the committee have begun to give attention to the taxpayers outside of the city boundary, and to give them fair recognition as taxpayers in this District.

Mr. PITNEY. And the allowances that we are making are on streets built at private expense in a large measure.

Mr. GROUT. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman complains about this bill. It is really the largest ever reported to the House from the Committee on Appropriations. It is larger than the bill of last year by some $300,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the gentleman will admit that it is not larger in these items.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For paving Connecticut avenue and Columbia road, between Florida avenue and Eighteenth street extended, $36,000: Provided, That the owners thereof shall dedicate the spaces for widening said Columbia road within the limits named, for conformity with the recorded plans of highway extensions.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of economy, I move to strike out, before the word "thousand," in line 3, page 16, the words "thirty-six," and insert "ten," so that it will read "$10,000," etc. The provision in the bill grants for two streets several hundred dollars more than it grants for the whole city of Georgetown. It seems to me that this amendment must, by its fairness and justice, commend itself to every member of the House.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bathing beach: For the care and repair of the public bathing beach on the Potomac River, in the District of Columbia, $1,000.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 18, the paragraph beginning with line 13 and ending with the line 15. I see no use in this expenditure for the purpose of keeping in repair this bathing beach. It seems to me to be utter nonsense, and I hope the paragraph will be stricken out.

The amendment was rejected.

For sixty-one teachers at $400 each; in all, $761,100:

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 24, page 21, insert: "For the establishment and maintenance of free kindergartens in the District of Columbia under the control of trustees and superintendent of public schools, $10,000."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is evident upon its face. In these modern times it has come to be a necessity in public school education to start with the kindergarten. I think it will be admitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and by every gentleman here present that the best educators of our land favor these primary institutions. This amendment is intended merely to make a commencement in the District of Columbia under the proper authorities. Heretofore these institutions have been conducted as private schools, and families in this city and in this District who should have been served by the public schools have been compelled to spend their own money for the education of their little children. This amendment, if adopted, will enable the trustees and superintendents to make a commencement in this line and to give the system a fair trial and report upon it next year, so that, having expended only the sum of $10,000 for this purpose, the committee can receive from them a full report as to the necessity or the advisability of continuing the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment does not seem to me to be subject to the point of order, because it is in line with appropriations in this bill and is simply an additional item for the support of such other teachers as the amount appropriated will justify the employment of. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will accept the amendment, as he knows that it is very deeply in the interest of the poorer people of the District, even of those who live in the slums. This is a start in the right direction. It is advocated by nearly all the women of the District who are engaged in charitable work, and I trust it will pass.

Mr. GROUT. Speaking for the committee, I must say I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Have you any objection to it?

Mr. GROUT. Yes; I have this objection: The committee, some of them at least, thought that possibly at another time we might appropriate for schools of this kind. At some future time it may be wise to provide the kindergarten as a department of our public school system, for the benefit of children below the age of 6 (which I believe is the age at which children are admitted to the public schools, though I am told that rule is not always enforced)—the committee, I say, thought that at some future time it might be advisable to establish these small children's schools. But it seems to me it ought to be postponed until some future time, when prosperity shall have returned and everybody will feel a little freer to expend the money which we shall then have in the Treasury, instead of appropriating, as now, that which we have not in the Treasury. This object was estimated for by the Commissioners of the District, but the committee thought it wise to postpone it; I can not, therefore, accept this amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. It may be that this sum is too large, and that so much as $10,000 ought not to be appropriated at this time for this purpose, but it does seem to me that we ought to begin this branch of education now. It is the very foundation of our system. I have known of a number of kindergarten schools in Washington maintained by private charity. There is one that I have heard spoken of as a model of its kind, the expenses of which are borne by one lady in this city. There is a multitude of little ones from 4 to 6 years of age who can not get into the public schools and who might be cared for in these kindergarten schools and might receive great benefit from them. Other cities are taking steps in this direction, and this city ought not to be behind. This subject has received the careful attention of the Commissioners of the District. The establishment of these schools meets their approval, and I think it meets the approval, individually, of a large majority of the Committee that have reported this bill. They have seen fit, for economical reasons, to withhold their favorable official action, but I hope the House will take the responsibility of starting this work, if not with $10,000, with $5,000, or an amount sufficient to make a beginning.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, so far as this work is to be regarded as an experiment, it would seem that an appropriation of money for the purpose at this time is wholly impracticable.

I think it is usually conceded everywhere throughout this country—in the larger cities at least—that it is meritorious. The whole effect of this proposition is to make an appropriation for the purpose of experimenting. Kindergarten schools have gone beyond the experimental stage. Their usefulness and efficiency are recognized throughout the nation. When the Treasury is in better condition—when times are more propitious—this House will doubtless make an appropriation, not to experiment in this matter, but to carry out some general plan upon the subject. At this time, with the Treasury in its depleted condition, it would be bad policy to make an appropriation for the purpose suggested by the amendment.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Did I or did I not read some time in December last that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury said that we did not need any more revenue; that we had $128,000,000 of surplus in the Treasury?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, Mr. Chairman; but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who is usually very cautious and prudent in protecting the Treasury, remarked that that was a borrowed surplus. That is not the kind of surplus that gentlemen on this side favor. It is not the kind that we expect to use in dealing fully and sometimes even charitably with the necessities of this District. When a surplus shall have reached the Treasury in the regular way, by taxation—a surplus that will be maintained without borrowing and without selling bonds—it will be time enough to venture upon these additional educational propositions. Mr. Chairman, the committee at the present time have treated with extreme liberality the educational institutions of this District. They have provided in this bill for 2 new schools and for 36 additional teachers. The District ought to be satisfied. I do not understand that the parties having in charge the educational institutions of this District and answerable for them are pressing this matter. It is more a question of sentiment now than one of absolute necessity. We have done what we could consistently with proper economy. In this bill we have sought in every way to give to the District the most liberal appropriations that the condition of the Treasury would permit. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. KIEFER. Will the gentleman state just what amount of money is now claimed by the United States Treasurer to be in the Treasury?

Mr. BLUE. I do not remember the exact amount. I did not examine the report this morning. But so far as that is concerned, I suppose that one hundred millions of the amount there is for a special purpose; and the Treasury, even upon the reports of the present Secretary, is not showing any very healthy condition, unless it has changed materially within the last few days.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] insist on the point of order?

Mr. DOCKERY. No.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I now renew the amendment, with $5,000 inserted instead of $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment as now submitted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 24, page 1, the following:
"For the establishment and maintenance of free kindergartens in the District of Columbia, under the control of the trustees and superintendent of the public schools, $5,000."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I propose to say merely a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE]. Nowhere in this country, and certainly nowhere in Europe, are kindergartens any longer experiments, unless such may be the case in the State of Kansas. They are well known in the District of Columbia; they are well known everywhere, and the trustees of the public schools——

Mr. BLUE. That is just what I stated. I stated that they were no longer an experiment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I understood the gentleman to say that they were.

Mr. BLUE. No, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then I stand corrected so far as the gentleman's remarks are concerned, and will include Kansas in the statement that kindergartens are nowhere an experiment.

I was about to say that the trustees and superintendent of the schools in the District of Columbia are ready now to take hold of these kindergartens and put such number of them as the appropriation may justify in immediate use in Washington, Georgetown, and the surrounding country. There is no way in which the poor children of this city can be kept out of the streets and out of pollution so easily and so cheaply and with so much benefit to themselves as by the establishment of kindergartens. I hope that this small appropriation of $5,000 will be allowed for that purpose.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For constructing second story, and for heating plant of school building at Congress Heights, to be immediately available, $12,000.

Mr. BLUE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13, page 25, insert:

"For purchase of additional ground and for additional building of two rooms, near line of Connecticut avenue, south of Chevy Chase Circle, to be immediately available, $8,000."

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I present this amendment on behalf of the Subcommittee on Appropriations because it was overlooked in part, there having been an appropriation made in the former bill for a two-room building in the locality named. The committee regarded it as economical that this amendment be adopted at this time, so that a building may be constructed of this capacity to meet the demands in that vicinity. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BLUE was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DOLLIVER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2037) to provide times and places for holding terms of United States courts in Utah, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HOAR, Mr. VILAS, and Mr. CANNON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States, had further insisted upon its amendments, asked a further conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. FAULKNER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Increase fire department: For one new engine, $4,200;
For one hose carriage, $900;
For house, lot, and furniture for one engine company, to be located in Anacostia, $16,200; in all, $21,300.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. If I understand it correctly, it provides for the purchase of one new fire engine?

Mr. GROUT. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. One engine, at a cost of $4,200.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that, I take it, is not a sufficient increase for the needs of this city. I think instead of providing for one new engine there ought to be a provision for at least five. I have recently seen a statement made by the chief of the fire department of the city of Washington alleging that the number of engines in this city is not sufficient and that the facilities for fighting fires are not adequate. If I am not mistaken, in that statement it is shown that in every other city in the United States—possibly not in all of them, but nearly all—of a population equal to that of the city of Washington, they have at least five engines more than we have in service here. If I do not mistake, we have but ten engines in service.

I will ask the chairman if that is not so? I believe there is no other city in the United States having a population equal to this city that has less than fifteen, and some as high as twenty engines.

Mr. GROUT. I am not able, just at the moment, to state the exact number of engines, but will give the gentleman the information in a few minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that to be the number; but I will not pretend to be accurate or exact. It is, however, somewhere in that neighborhood. I am accurate, though, in the statement that we have at least five engines less than any other city of the size of the city of Washington; and the statement is made by the chief of the fire department of the city that the number is totally inadequate for the service required.

I think the Government of the United States ought to have in this the capital city of the nation the most efficient fire department that can be found anywhere in the United States. I think we ought not to be economical in this particular respect beyond proper limits; and I hope the gentleman will not resist an amendment which I shall offer, increasing the number to five instead of one. We ought to have five additional engines provided.

The statement to which I have referred was made a few weeks ago as the result of a very disastrous fire which occurred (I refer to the statement of the chief of the fire department) near the Government Printing Office, when a large lumber mill and considerable property were destroyed, and during the time the fire was in progress a general alarm was sounded for a fire at some other point, the exact location of which I do not now recall. He said that his opportunity for fighting a fire was greatly hampered, limited, and impaired because of the want of a sufficient number of fire engines, and suggested that there ought to be at least five more added to the service here.

I move, therefore, Mr. Chairman, in the paragraph now pending, to strike out "one" and insert "five," so as to increase the purchase of fire engines to five, and increase the sum of the appropriation to correspond.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, there is a good fire department in this city, and I think the House will take judicial notice of the fact that fires are well and thoroughly handled here. The unsurpassed streets and their paving in the city of Washington furnish facilities for engines assembling at a fire which are furnished by no other city in the world, according to population and area. We therefore really need fewer engines, because the streets are so wide and so little occupied by traffic and travel that the engines can go and do go at breakneck speed to a fire. Really, there is no city in the world where the assembling of the fire force on an alarm is so thrilling as in this city. And for the reasons stated I say we have a good fire department. And now a word as to the number of engines. Turning to a letter written to the committee by the chief engineer of the fire department, it seems that there are 12 engines in the city, 10 in service and 2 in reserve; 13 hose carriages, 10 in service, 2 in reserve; 2 fuel wagons in service; 2 supply wagons in service; 5 trucks, 4 in service and 1 in reserve; 1 chemical engine, capacity 160 gallons, in service; 1 chemical engine, capacity 170 gallons, in service; 1 buggy for the use of the engineer of the fire department, and so on.

The committee wanted full information, so that we might deal fairly with the fire department, and called upon the chief for these particulars. They are furnished in a letter found on page 101 of the hearings.

Let me also call your attention to the steady increase in the expense of the fire department in this city, which is fairly commensurate with its needs. In 1893 we appropriated $36,320 for its increase; in 1894, $2,640; in 1895 we appropriated $42,720; in 1896, $68,000; in 1897, $51,700, and the amount carried in this bill is a further increase of $21,300.

This engine that the bill provides for is supposed to take the place of some old engine in the populous part of the city, which older engine will go to Anacostia, there to be housed in the place provided for by this paragraph of the bill.

A new hose carriage was deemed necessary, and that has been provided, at $900. The situation at Anacostia is peculiar. The fire department can only reach it by the bridges across the river, and the bulk of the suburb is reached only by the Navy-Yard Bridge. There is a draw in that bridge. It is an old and weak bridge, across which a fire engine could not be taken at full speed, and if the draw were up not at all without perhaps dangerous delay. To meet the necessities of that growing suburb it was thought by the committee that this fire engine might well be provided, a large new one being purchased for the city of Washington to take the place of one of less capacity to be moved to Anacostia.

Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, that fairly liberal provision has been made by this bill for the fire department.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will not insist on the amendment if the committee do not consent. I wish to ask the gentleman if he has the annual report of the Commissioners, and if that report itself does not include a request of the chief of the fire department for additional service, and if the Commissioners themselves have not recommended that additional facilities be afforded by an increase in the number of engines? I will state to the gentleman that I cut out of a newspaper a letter, which I have no doubt was authentic, from the chief of the fire department, in which he states that it is absolutely necessary, in order that he may render efficient service in fighting these fires, that he have an additional number of engines; and my impression is that he said he had appealed to Congress to give him additional engines.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I infer that the gentleman has been visiting with the chief engineer of the fire department.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I will say to the gentleman that I have not been visiting him. I do not know him, and never saw him in my life.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman asks me if we have the report of the Commissioners here. It is not before me. It is true the Commissioners asked for additional engines. Last year we provided for two new engines, and this year we have provided in this bill the men to man those engines, twenty in number; and next year we shall have to provide ten additional men for this new engine, when the house is completed for it and the engine in it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will not agree to the amendment, I shall not insist on it, and I withdraw it.

And then, on motion of Mr. GROUT, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10167) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2253) for the relief of Barzilla C. Hudson;

A bill (S. 1624) to quiet title and possession with respect to certain unconfirmed and located private land claims in the State of Louisiana;

A bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company;

A bill (S. 2129) granting an increase of pension to Annie E. Nolan;

A bill (S. 361) for the relief of Silas P. Keller; and

A bill (H. R. 9499) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to A. L. Williams, and for other purposes.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, the immigration bill is on the Speaker's table. I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the further conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DANFORD, Mr. WILSON of South Carolina, and Mr. BARTHOLDT.

MARY W. KEEFFE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 906, "An act granting a pension to Mary W. Keeffe," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted, insert $25; and the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

FRANK J. CANNON,
GEO. L. SHOUP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House make the following statement upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses:

As passed by the Senate, the bill carried $30 per month, which sum the House reduced to $20. The effect of the conference report is to grant the beneficiary $25 per month, being in the nature of a compromise, the Senate making a concession of $5 and the House conceding a like amount.

The soldier died of disabilities contracted in the line of duty, and the beneficiary named in the bill is now drawing a pension of $20 per month.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

ADELAIDE MORRIS.

Mr. THOMAS. I also present another conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 757, "An act granting an increase of pension to Adelaide Morris," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted, insert $35; and the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
W. N. ROACH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House make the following statement upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses:

As it passed the Senate the bill carried $50 per month, which was reduced to $25 by the House. The effect of the conference report is to grant the beneficiary $35 per month, a concession of $15 by the Senate and $10 by the House.

The managers on the part of the House have been led to make this concession because the soldier had a very gallant record, particularly distinguishing himself at the battle of Antietam, on which account he was given the rank of brevet captain, though but 19 years of age. He was in many battles, and after the close of the war participated in the Indian campaigns. He died from disabilities contracted and incurred in the line of duty.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

MARION M'KIBBEN.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I present another conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 684, "An act granting an increase of pension to Marion McKibben," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
GEO. L. SHOUP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House make the following statement upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses:

As it passed the Senate the bill carried $50 per month, which was reduced by the House to $40. The effect of the conference report is to recede from the House amendment and grant the beneficiary $50 per month.

The managers on the part of the House have been led to make this concession because of the unusually long and gallant services of the soldier. He served during the war with Mexico, and was several times promoted for gallant conduct during the late war. He rose to the rank of brevet brigadier-general, and died from disabilities contracted in the line of duty. The beneficiary named in the bill is now receiving $30 per month under the general law.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

CAROLINE A. HOUGH.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 3622) that was under consideration when the House went into Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3622) to increase the pension of Caroline A. Hough, widow of Brig. Gen. John Hough.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Caroline A. Hough, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John Hough, upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and grant her a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension of $17 per month which she is now receiving.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know something about this. I ask for the reading of the report, reserving the right to object.

Mr. WOOD. This bill has already passed the House and passed the Senate. It was considered in Committee of the Whole. It was not signed, having reached the President just a short time before the recess. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is in precisely the same condition as the bill of Mrs. Carr.

Mr. ERDMAN. I would like to know something about the bill. I know nothing about it.

Mr. WOOD. I can make a statement concerning the bill, if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. MILES. Is this one of the cases that was considered or not considered last Friday night in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WOOD. It was considered by Committee of the Whole and in the House, and passed.

Mr. MILES. But not last Friday night?

Mr. WOOD. It was not passed last Friday night. It was passed in December. It passed both branches.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman means that the original bill, which failed to be signed by the President, was passed, and this is identical with that bill.

Mr. WOOD. This is identical.

The SPEAKER. It is identical with the original bill; but not this bill.

Mr. WOOD. But a bill identically like it. There would be no good purpose in referring it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and having it considered in the Committee of the Whole. It has been before both and has been well considered. It is in precisely the same condition as the bill of Mrs. Carr, and it ought to pass. The beneficiary is a very worthy and very feeble old lady. The service of this officer was distinguished; and I hope the House will consent to its being taken up and passed.

Mr. BLUE. This is only for $50?

Mr. WOOD. That is all.

Mr. BLUE. The same as the other?

Mr. WOOD. The same as the other.

Mr. BAILEY. This bill has not been considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WOOD. A bill precisely like this has.

Mr. PAYNE. A bill exactly like this one passed last session both the House and the Senate, and went to the President just before the recess, and the ten days expired during the recess.

Mr. BAILEY. My question was, if this bill had been considered in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. PAYNE. This bill has not been, but one that is precisely like it went to the President and failed to be signed. This bill has passed the Senate and came from the Senate over here, so that the same subject-matter has been considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAILEY. But my question referred to this particular bill.

Mr. PAYNE. This particular numbered bill has not been considered; but I want to say to the gentleman that a bill under precisely the same circumstances passed this House this morning by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. This House has gone absolutely mad on the pension question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman why this woman can not be pensioned under the law?

Mr. WOOD. She is pensioned under the general law at $17 a month.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all she is entitled to under the law?

Mr. WOOD. She is pensioned at the rate of $17 a month, that being based on the rank her husband had at the time when the wound was received. That would be the highest rate that she could get at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. MILES. His rank was such that she could get no more?

Mr. WOOD. His rank at the time was such she could get no more.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, the Chair asked the question of the gentleman from Illinois, whether or not this was the identical bill that had passed the House previously and had failed to receive the signature of the President. I will say in explanation that the bill that passed the House in December last called for $50 per month, and the Senate has repassed the bill. The original bill having failed to become a law at the figure that has been agreed upon as the amount that should be allowed to the widows of general officers of the Army, $50 per month, this bill proposes to give the beneficiary that amount.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FARIS, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MILES, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MARTIN, for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the legislature of South Dakota, praying that Fort Meade, in that State, be made a permanent military reservation; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE, Pierre, S. Dak.

A joint resolution and memorial requesting the Congress of the United States to make Fort Meade a permanent military reservation.

Be it resolved by the senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of representatives concurring), Whereas there is but one military post of any importance within the State of South Dakota, to wit, Fort Meade, located in Meade County, S. Dak., in the eastern part of the Black Hills, adjacent to the Sioux Indian Reservation in this State, and with rapid railroad connection to the Crow Indian Reservation in Montana, which said post is conceded by the military authorities to excel all other Western posts as a strategic point, and has now permanent features, to wit, a large brick hospital and a permanent connection with the water system of Sturgis, S. Dak.; and

Whereas the Federal Government has allotted lands to the Indians and by other acts has made the several Sioux Indian reservations apparently permanent in their character, we deem it necessary for the protection of the people of the western part of this State that such military post should be made permanent: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we favor and hereby urge the Congress of the United States, by statute if necessary, to make said Fort Meade a permanent military post; and

Be it further resolved, That we request the Senators and Representatives from this State in Congress to use their best endeavors to accomplish this result.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the legislature of South Dakota, praying for the enactment of a free-homestead law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE, Pierre, S. Dak.

A joint resolution memorializing Congress for a free-homestead law.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the legislature of South Dakota hereby petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact a law, as speedily as possible, permitting settlers upon Government lands in this State to make final proof upon their homestead claims and acquire title thereto without the payment of any specific price per acre, as required under the present law. The demand for such a law has been emphasized in the various platforms of the political parties of this State and of this nation, and is the universal wish of the people.

The settler who endures the hardships and privations necessary to make settlement upon and improve 160 acres of unbroken prairie, being, as a rule, poor and without means, pays enough for the land by the toil and sacrifice he must make, without the payment of the price exacted by the Government under the present law.

And for the passage of such a law your memorialists will ever pray.

Approved this 29th day of January, A. D. 1897, at 2.30 p. m.

Mr. THURSTON, from the Select Committee on International Expositions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3489) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi and international exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898," approved June 10, 1896, to repeal certain portions thereof, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. ALLEN December 9, 1896, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, the amendment providing for carrying out the provisions of the act to encourage the holding of a transmississippi international exposition in 1898, submitted a report thereon, which, with the accompanying amendment, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5473) concerning delivery of letters in towns, villages, and other places where no free delivery exists, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 243) providing for the printing of the Consular Regulations of 1896, to report it without amendment, and I ask that it be put on its passage.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to print 2,900 copies, 800 copies for the use of the Senate, 1,600 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies to be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents for sale.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES STEWART.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have passed a little bill, the bill (H. R. 897) for the relief of James Stewart. It will take but a moment. It is a House bill favorably reported.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the bill on the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a brief report which will explain the whole matter. It is simply the case of an old soldier who desires to sue in the Court of Claims for what he claims to be due him. It simply gives him authority to sue.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BURROWS January 20, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 897) for the relief of James Stewart, have examined the same and submit the following report thereon:

This claim received favorable reports from the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and the Committee on War Claims of the House during the Fifty-third Congress, and was passed by both Houses, but failed to become a law on account of its reaching the President too late to receive his signature.

It has been favorably reported by the Committee on War Claims in the Fifty-fourth Congress, which report your committee adopt as part of their report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report referred to is as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 897) for the relief of James Stewart, submit the following report:

This claim was presented in the Fifty-third Congress, and was favorably reported upon by the Committee on War Claims of the House and the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, to whom it was referred.

After a careful investigation of the facts involved, your committee adopt the report of the Fifty-third Congress, a copy thereof being hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[Senate Report No. 970, Fifty-third Congress, third session.]

The principle upon which this bill is based has been repeatedly established in cases to which this one pertains, particularly in the case of Captain Pullman, and in an omnibus bill, now on the Calendar, for the relief of many officers designated by name.

The claim is for longevity pay on account of length of service, being one additional ration for each five years of service.

The present bill merely allows Captain Stewart to bring suit in the Court of Claims.

The report of the House committee is hereto appended.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

[House Report No. 426, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5224) for the relief of James Stewart, report:

James Stewart served continuously as an enlisted man in the United States Regular Army from October 29, 1851, to November 15, 1861, when he was commissioned second lieutenant in the Fourth Artillery, United States Army, and served as a commissioned officer in the United States Army from then till June 18, 1878. During the time he served as such commissioned officer the following provisions of law were, respectively, in force:

"That every commissioned officer of the line or staff, exclusive of general officers, shall be entitled to receive one additional ration per diem for every five years he may have served or shall serve in the Army of the United States. (5 Stat. L., section 15, page 258, act of July 5, 1838.)

"There shall be allowed and paid to each commissioned officer below the rank of brigadier-general, including chaplains and others having assimilated rank or pay, 10 per cent of their current yearly pay for each term of five years of service." (Act of July 15, 1870, now section 1262 of the Revised Statutes.)

He was paid for his services in the said interval of time from November 15, 1861, to June 18, 1878, merely what other officers of his grade were generally paid; and he was paid or allowed nothing whatever in this interval of time on account of his said prior length of service in the United States Army as an enlisted man. For this reason he alleges he was short paid for his services rendered during the said interval of time from November 15, 1861, to June 18, 1878, partially in the suppression of the late rebellion, and requests the passage of this bill, the sole object of which is to remove any statutable limitation bar that exists, or may exist, to prevent the Court of Claims from hearing and determining his demand in the premises as if it accrued within six years.

The commutation value or price thus put in controversy of the one additional ration per diem for every five years of prior service computes to about the sum of $1,200, and your committee, having fully considered the matter, can see no reason why the question involved should not be heard and determined, as this officer requests, in the Court of Claims.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest a little amendment which the House will doubtless concur in, and with that I have no objection to the bill. In line 6, after the word "wages," I move to insert "alleged to have been;" so as to read "wages alleged to have been earned." I do not want any admission that he has earned wages for the time he is calling for pay.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the amendment except that it might create delay in the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be no trouble. The House will concur in the amendment as soon as the bill goes back.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, if the Senator thinks so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to insert those words in the sixth line; so as to read "wages alleged to have been earned by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. GRAY. I rise to a privileged question, Mr. President, and ask leave to present the credentials of Richard R. Kenney as a Senator from the State of Delaware.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF DELAWARE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 19th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1897, Richard R. Kenney was duly elected by the legislature of Delaware a Senator to represent said State in the Senate of the United States to fill a vacancy existing in the representation of said State for the term ending the 3d day of March, A. D. 1901.

Witness his excellency our governor, Ebe W. Tunnell, and our seal hereunto affixed at Dover this 21st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1897, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and twenty-first.

EBE W. TUNNELL.

By the governor:
WM. H. BRYCE,
Secretary of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be filed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Delaware what action he proposes, if any, to have taken at this time?

Mr. GRAY. I was about to state, and will now state, that Mr. Kenney is present and ready to be sworn in. I ask that the oath may be administered to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator-elect is sworn in, I desire to make a brief statement.

I shall not object to his being sworn in upon those credentials; but I believe that the vacancy in this body should be filled by Henry A. Du Pont, who was lawfully elected and ought to be here according to law and justice, as I understand the case. If, however, Mr. Du Pont is not entitled to the seat, I believe that the legislature of Delaware which chose Mr. Kenney was a legislative body fraudulently created and not entitled to elect a Senator.

These matters, Mr. President, will doubtless be brought before the Senate in due time in contest of the right of Mr. Kenney to retain his seat in this body.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement also before the Senate admits this gentleman to a seat.

At the last session of the Senate, the Senate determined by a majority of one, I think (I was not present when the final vote took place, being absent in consequence of illness), that Mr. Henry A. Du Pont was not entitled to a seat in the Senate. The result necessarily involved in that determination was the decision of the Senate that a vacancy existed from the State of Delaware.

I suppose it is unnecessary to say that I dissented from the opinion on which that vote of the Senate was based. The question was whether the acting governor, formerly speaker of the senate and formerly a member of the senate, was disqualified from voting under the Delaware constitution by his accepting and entering upon the then vacant office of governor. I thought then and think now that it was just such an act of usurped authority when he undertook to vote as it would have been if President Johnson or President Arthur had come back to the Senate here and undertaken to preside as Vice-President and to give a casting vote on some important question. I never have changed that opinion, and I have no great doubt about it. But the Senate adjudged otherwise.

The Senate is made by the Constitution the judge of the election and qualification of its members, and its judgment is just as binding in law, in all constitutional vigor and potency, when it is rendered by one majority as it is when it is unanimous. I remember very well what I think was one of the most admirable public utterances of the late James G. Blaine. The year after his own party had nearly lost the State government by an attempted fraud and usurpation on the part of their antagonists there was a contested election, that party then being in power. It was very close, and Mr. Blaine declared that one majority for Plaisted was as good as a thousand in entitling Mr. Blaine's opponent, Governor Plaisted, to the seat.

Now, what was the effect of that judgment of the Senate? It seems to me that it was the same as a judgment of a court would have been fixing the rights of parties. It may be undoubtedly reviewed for newly-discovered evidence; it may undoubtedly be vacated for an error in the record, as if we should discover that one or two Senators who were recorded as voting one way in fact voted another way. I suppose it could be vacated if it should turn out, to use an illustration that some one else made in my hearing recently, that that governor, when it was supposed he voted in the Delaware legislature, was falsely impersonated by some one else and was not there at all. But, although parliamentary proceedings differ in form from those of courts, the great rule on which the safety of all human property and transactions depend, established in courts of justice, ought in substance to govern us here.

There has been an application on the part of Mr. Du Pont—whom I respect personally, whom I eagerly desire should have a seat in this body, and who I think ought to have had one on the merits of his case—to reopen that case. No newly-discovered evidence is suggested; no fraud or mistake is suggested. The reopening of the case would merely be a reconsideration of a question of constitutional law which this great constitutional court has decided once. That is all he asks, and that is all he would obtain if his prayer for a reopening of the case were granted.

That petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and after a very able and interesting argument in favor of Mr. Du Pont by Mr. Garland, late Attorney-General—and it is not necessary to say that any argument that gentleman makes will be able and interesting—the committee unanimously decided this morning that there had been an adjudication by the Senate and that nothing further remained to be done. It was unanimously decided with the exception of one member, who was not prepared to determine what was his duty at the particular time.

Mr. President, I propose to act upon that doctrine. I think it is very important for constitutional government, very important to the dignity and authority of the Senate, very important for the peace of the country that we should stand by these principles.

It is a very unpleasant thing to me that Mr. Du Pont is not to take his seat, and that some one else is to take it But it would be a very bad thing for every citizen of this country unless the Senate of the United States could act and could be known to act upon great questions where right and righteousness are involved in pursuance of a law other and higher than its own desire.

If it be true that Mr. Du Pont was not legally elected, or if it be true that that question has been settled by a judgment of the Senate, it follows that there is a vacancy, and that there was a vacancy at the time of the alleged election of Mr. Kenney, in the office of Senator from the State of Delaware; and there being a vacancy under the Constitution and statute of the United States, the credential in due form, signed by the executive of that State, gives the gentleman who now applies for the seat a prima facie title to the seat, subject, as has been suggested by my honorable friend from New Hampshire, to reexamination on the merits hereafter, if that reexamination shall be desired.

I therefore assent to the request of the Senator from Delaware that the oath be administered.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator, before he sits down, whether in this case the committee have filed a written report?

Mr. HOAR. I will state that the committee came to that conclusion this morning, and it will take some little time to prepare a report.

Mr. TELLER. The committee will present a report?

Mr. HOAR. I have been instructed as acting chairman to prepare and present a written report. Of course I could not have it ready now. It will be filed in a week or two.

Mr. TELLER. All I want to say is that I thought we ought to have a report from the committee, and that it ought to be filed.

Mr. HOAR. There will be such a report.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Kenney, whose credentials have just been read in the hearing of the Senate, is present in the Chamber and ready to take the oath of office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Senator-elect will come forward and receive the oath of office.

Mr. Kenney was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. GRAY, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 3658) granting an increase of pension to Alexander Swallow, of Platte County, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3659) to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Thomas Blackburn, of Keith County, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3660) designating the national patriotic song; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 3661) for the relief of Abner Abercrombie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TURPIE (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANTLE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CANNON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 3d instant approved and signed the act (S. 1128) granting a pension to Isabella Morrow.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate, as a part of the morning business, the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution instructing the Committee on Pacific Railroads to inquire and report to the Senate whether the executive department has, by existing law, authority to foreclose the Government mortgage or lien on the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific railroads, etc.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will allow me to move that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of House bill 7083.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. THURSTON. Day before yesterday I had partially addressed myself to the pending resolution. I should like very much to go on this morning.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the bill will not take many minutes, but I do not know whether it will or not. I very much desire to have it disposed of.

Mr. THURSTON. I should like to yield to the Senator from Vermont, but yesterday morning his bill took the entire time, and I have every reason to believe that it will take the time of several morning hours if it is again placed before the Senate. However, if the matter can be disposed of without consuming any considerable time, I have not the slightest objection. I am very anxious to go on this morning with my discussion of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that there will be an amendment offered to the bill, and I hope it will be taken up now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska having yielded the floor, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont, who moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HILL. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7083) to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building, and for other purposes.

Mr. HILL. That bill will take considerable debate, Mr. President. I understood that yesterday the Senator from Nebraska gave notice that he would ask to be heard upon the resolution this morning. I informed several Senators to that effect, and we did not expect the bill to come up to-day. In fact, I left at home my papers in relation to the bill. Still I think I could make a few brief remarks on the question. A large number of amendments are to be offered by several Senators, which will lead to a discussion and a lengthy debate. The Senate is pretty closely divided, I should judge from the vote, on the bill, and to take it up now and crowd out the Senator from Nebraska is hardly a proper thing, I think.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose the Senator from New York could take the floor and occupy it from now until the 4th of March, but I hardly think he will be disposed to do that. Therefore I prefer to have the bill brought before the Senate and amended, and passed, if possible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the motion.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator from Vermont make the motion now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is pending.

Mr. HILL. Is not the resolution a part of the morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a part of the morning business.

Mr. HILL. Then, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Chair laid before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska on the right of the Chair coming over from a previous day, and upon the resolution the Senator from Nebraska on the left of the Chair was entitled to the floor. The Senator from Nebraska has yielded the floor.

Mr. HILL. The morning business is here. The Senator from Nebraska can not give way the morning business. It is properly here.

Mr. BERRY. The motion is in order, nevertheless.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a matter for the Senate to determine. The Chair will submit to the Senate the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Nebraska can himself, of course, give away his right to speak, but the resolution is here as a part of the routine morning business coming over, and any other Senator has a right to speak on that morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unquestionably that is correct.

Mr. HILL. Then I raise the point of order——

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I think I made a very explicit statement that I would yield to the Senator from Vermont if the matter that he desired I should yield for would not lead to debate and consume time. I did express a very earnest desire to proceed with my remarks during the morning hour to-day. I am in the middle of what I believe to be an important discussion, and I should like very much to conclude. I have not sought opportunities to occupy the time of the Senate during this session. It is the first matter that I have undertaken to speak upon at any length.

Mr. MORRILL. I will no longer press the bill, out of consideration for the Senator from Nebraska, who desires to finish his speech. I think he ought to have an opportunity to conclude what he has to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized upon the pending resolution.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska kindly yields for me to make a request. At least a score of Senators have been urging me to ask consideration for the few pension bills on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that at the hour of 4.30 o'clock this afternoon the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLS. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at the hour of 4.30 to-day the Calendar of pension bills be taken up and considered by the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. Unobjected cases?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unobjected cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to hear the request again, please. Is it for unobjected bills?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unobjected bills on the pension Calendar. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I have made this request at the suggestion of at least a score of Senators, mostly on his side of the Chamber.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to say that I have no objection at all, but I should be glad if unobjected bills of another class, House bills, might also be taken up. There are a number of them. There will be no difficulty about passing the pension bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will take only a few minutes to clear the pension Calendar.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well. I ask leave to add to the Senator's request, that unobjected House bills may then be taken up.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the general Calendar?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. That they shall follow the consideration of the pension bills?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HILL. What is the precise request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at 4.30 to-day unobjected pension bills be taken from the Calendar for consideration, to which the Senator from Virginia adds a request that House bills, as the Chair understood, be then considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. After the pension Calendar has been cleared.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the pension bills have been considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unobjected cases on the general Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN January 28, 1897, instructing the Committee on Pacific Railroads to inquire and report to the Senate whether the executive department has, by existing law, authority to foreclose the Government mortgage or lien on the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific Railroads, etc.

Mr. THURSTON resumed the speech begun by him on Wednesday. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3247.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

Mr. THURSTON. I ask that the pending resolutions may go over without prejudice, and I give notice that to-morrow morning, after the usual routine business, I shall ask unanimous consent to continue the discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Nebraska? If there is no objection, the resolutions will go over without prejudice, as requested by the Senator from Nebraska.

[Mr. THURSTON's speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.]

ADELAIDE MORRIS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 757) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide Morris, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted, insert "$35;" and the House agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
W. N. ROACH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MARION M'KIBBEN.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 684) granting an increase of pension to Marion McKibben, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

And the House recedes from its amendment.

J. H. GALLINGER,
GEORGE L. SHOUP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MARY W. KEEFFE.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 905) granting a pension to Mary W. Keeffe, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted, insert "$25;" and the House agree to the same.

FRANK J. CANNON,
GEO. L. SHOUP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY F. THOMAS,
GEO. C. CROWTHER,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 853) providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 8896) to increase the pension of Elizabeth Wellons, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HUDSON RESERVOIR AND CANAL COMPANY.

The bill (H. R. 9029) to grant to the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company the right of way through the Gila River Indian Reservation was read twice by its title.

Mr. PETTIGREW. A bill exactly like this one in words and terms has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is upon our Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be substituted on our Calendar for the bill reported by the Senate committee, that immediate consideration be given to the House bill, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the bill which has just come from the House of Representatives, to which he has referred, be substituted for the Senate bill of the same language, and that it be now considered, temporarily suspending the unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I object to any temporary suspension of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then I will ask, not that the bill be considered, but that it be substituted upon the Calendar for Senate bill 3167, as it is the same as the Senate bill which has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It will be so substituted, and the bill (S. 3167) to grant to the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company of Arizona the right of way through the Gila River Indian Reservation will be indefinitely postponed.

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN COMMISSION REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SEWELL, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The World's Columbian Commission has delivered to me certain documents and exhibits which they desire should constitute the final report required by section 12 of the act of Congress passed April 25, 1890, providing for the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, and the holding of an international exhibition in the city of Chicago.

The documents referred to embrace the reports of the president and secretary of the Commission and a report of the executive committee on awards, with exhibits relating to the same. They are contained in five boxes of considerable size, which, instead of actually transmitting with this communication, I have deposited in the State Department subject to the action and direction of the Congress.

I am informed that the Director-General of the Exposition has made a report directly to the Congress and that no report of the lady managers has yet been made.

The selection of such part of the material mentioned as may be considered necessary to constitute a final exhibit of the action of the Commission and the results of the Exposition is submitted to the discretion of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 5, 1897.

MRS. MARY GOULD CARR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3623) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Gould Carr, the widow of the late Brigadier and Brevet Major General Carr, United States Volunteers, deceased.

The amendment was, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty."

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill passed both Houses of Congress prior to the late holiday recess, at $75 per month, and was sent to the President of the United States. It is held that the bill failed to become a law because of the fact that the recess intervened. The Senate again passed the bill at $75, but the House, in its wisdom, has reduced the amount to $50, notwithstanding they had passed the bill previously at $75 a month. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives, and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. HILL, and Mr. SHOUP were appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] is recognized as entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me a moment?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. This bill has already passed the House. If it can get the consideration of the Senate at this time, it is hoped that before the session ends——

Mr. MORGAN. I object to any debate on the motion.

Mr. DANIEL. Let me finish my sentence.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that there may be incorporated in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by Lieut. Col. William Ludlow, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, who was at the head of the Board of Engineers appointed by the President to survey the line of the Nicaragua Canal.

I only desire to say in reference to the letter that I quoted from the remarks of Colonel Ludlow in a statement made before the House committee that had the Nicaragua Canal bill in charge. It was a statement that the Board of Engineers, of which he was a member, constituted, without exception, the only engineers who had ever gone over the entire route. My distinguished friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] quoted a part of the testimony that appears in the report of the select committee that reported this bill in response, and made remarks from which the inference might be drawn that Colonel Ludlow was inaccurate in his statement. I have not replied to the statements made by the Senator from Alabama, but I desire to call attention to the fact that the letter which I submit seems to furnish a very sufficient reply to that element of controversy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the letter will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT, GENERAL DEPOT,
OFFICE OF ENGINEER, THIRD DISTRICT,
Tompkinsville, N. Y., January 29, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I have but to-day the opportunity to read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the discussion in the Senate on Wednesday relative to the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Referring to my statement to the House committee in May last, that the late United States Nicaragua Canal board were the only engineers who have ever been over the entire route as laid down, and to Senator MORGAN'S quotations from Mr. Menocal's testimony before the House committee in opposition to that statement, I beg to invite your attention to Mr. Menocal's final admission before the committee that, as a matter of fact, he had not been over the San Francisco embankment line as located through the hills between Ochoa and the East Divide, and also had not been over the line of the San Carlos Ridge embankments since either of these important lines had been laid down, thereby confirming in categorical terms the fact stated by me to the committee, and which Mr. Menocal at an earlier stage sought to deny.

The statements to which I refer are found on page 357, lines 14 and 15 and 26 and 27 of Senate Document No. 315.

These admissions by Mr. Menocal, occurring almost at the close of the hearing, doubtless escaped the attention of Senator MORGAN, but not that of the committee to which they were made.

I may be permitted to add a few words as to the nature of the investigation and report made by the late canal board.

We were forty-two days in Nicaragua, and with the exception of a single day taken for the trip to the capital, to pay our respects to the Nicaraguan Government, in recognition of the numerous official courtesies shown us, we were constantly on and about the canal route and actively engaged in the study of its physics and conditions. We went carefully over the entire route from ocean to ocean, making a study of every material feature. Important surveys were made and vital data obtained for our better information and to supplement the deficiencies in the company's data. The report shows this.

We then proceeded to Costa Rica and to Colombia to examine the physics and conditions of the railroad and canal work in those two States and examine the effects of climate and rainfall. We then returned to New York and devoted three months to a thorough exploration of the engineering data and material that were contained in the company's records.

Our report, therefore, represents three months of arduous and persistent investigation on the Isthmus and three months more of still more difficult and laborious exploration and study of the entire mass of the company's data in New York.

In formulating our report in comformity with the act of Congress, it was inevitable that we should note and correct the errors and deficiencies in the company's project, which was the special task intrusted to us.

While omissions and shortcomings had to be stated and corrections made, the report itself was prepared as a conscientious, painstaking, impersonal, and conservative statement of facts, which we are confident will commend itself to the judgment of all professional engineers of standing and capacity as an intelligent and faithful contribution to the solution of the problem, when they shall have had an opportunity to study it. In its entirety and with the maps and other data necessary for an understanding of it, it has not yet been available for distribution.

It was sought before the House committee to offset the effect of our technical discussion and conclusions, based upon a thorough study of all the materials available, and a laborious and widespread search for outside information, by a fallacious attempt to show that the investigation was trifling; that but fourteen days were spent in or near the canal route; that our study of the subject was entirely superficial, and that therefore our opinions and judgment were destitute of weight or value.

This was Mr. Menocal's task before the committee, in his endeavor to meet the statements in our report of the numerous errors, omissions, and misstatements made by him in his official papers that in fact constituted the company's project, and in a futile endeavor to substantiate the fallacious and misleading estimates of cost to which the enterprise has been committed. The attempt resulted in seriously prejudicing the enterprise itself and hampering the endeavors of its legitimate advocates to secure action by Congress.

Incidentally it has had another result, which the members of the board particularly deplore—of putting us in a seeming attitude of antagonism to the success of a project which every one of us was heartily and unqualifiedly in favor of as an engineering matter of world-wide interest and commanding importance.

This position is one which we strongly object to, but which is the logical result of an unwise and insincere endeavor to break the force of our professional criticisms of Mr. Menocal's engineering work, which in effect does not constitute a valid or defensible project, and is hopelessly defective in several vital particulars, and which is a single and unfortunate aspect only of a grand engineering enterprise in which the American people and American engineers are deeply interested, but which no one can wish to further upon deceptive and fallacious data either of construction or estimate.

With reference to the estimated cost of the work as stated in our very moderate and conservative schedule, it is proper to say that the proffers and statements that have been made by responsible contractors, and which have been quoted as substantiating the entirely inadequate estimates by Mr. Menocal, do in very fact fully sustain and confirm the estimates as prepared and submitted by the board pursuant to the duty imposed upon it by Congress, and with a full consciousness of its responsibility, both individual and official.

All of which is susceptible of ready and conclusive demonstration.

Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM LUDLOW,

Lieutenant-Colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

Senator JOHN W. DANIEL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I do not underestimate the importance of the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal. That the agricultural and commercial interests of the country demand it I do not think can be successfully denied. By cutting a channel 168 miles long, the Atlantic and Pacific oceans will be brought together and 10,000 miles of ocean voyage around the Horn will be saved to our ocean carrying trade. But the Government should own and control it, and should not, by subvention or in any other manner, pledge the credit of the nation to a private corporation for money with which to carry on the work, thus taking upon itself responsibility for the success or failure of a private enterprise. It is quite safe to say that the construction of the canal, before it will have become completed and made perfect, will cost in round numbers $300,000,000, and the experience of the people in granting aid to the Pacific railway systems by means of bonds affords a valuable lesson we must not now ignore.

Nor will the financial condition of our country admit of entering upon this colossal undertaking at this time. The people were never in worse financial plight than at this moment. All business is at a standstill. Within the last four years the value of property has fallen 50 per cent. There is poverty and bankruptcy in the land, and suicide following as a sequence. Conditions are constantly growing harder, and it would be as unwise as it would be unpatriotic to now tax the people and the resources of the country to secure money to build this canal; and for the time being, at least, it must be laid aside.

The first and most imperative duty for us to perform is to determine on a definite financial policy; one that will increase the resources of the people, energize business in all directions, restore confidence—of which we have heard so much in recent months—and after this has been accomplished we can well afford to turn our attention to the dazzling and important enterprise of building and owning the Nicaraguan Canal.

I will not, for one, vote for the issuance of bonds in any form, or for anything. We have reached the limit; the country has become bond crazy and bond weary, and no form of property, except gold and bonds, is at par at this time. We must retrace our steps speedily and conscientiously if we would not engulf our country in lasting ruin and bring our people to a condition of perpetual poverty.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, after the distinguished and honorable Senators from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], and from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] have reaped so bountiful a harvest of logic, of eloquence, and of exhaustive analysis in regard to the provisions of the pending bill, there may be perhaps left but a few sheaves for me to garner or to glean of argument or statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. President, when the minister plenipotentiary of the Greater Republic of Central America, through the Secretary of State, communicated to this body his protest against the pending bill it occurred to me that then and there we should have called a halt. That protest was virtually directed to the Government of the United States acting through its legislative branch so as to affect the rights of Nicaragua, one of the States of this Greater Republic which this minister plenipotentiary represents. That protest set out in effect that some of the vital provisions of the cession under which the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua had the right to construct this canal were violated and impinged upon; and inasmuch as in my opinion the United States represents the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua in all of its rights, and stands in lieu of that company so far as the cession from Nicaragua and Costa Rica is concerned, I thought that virtually this protest was directed to the proceeding in the legislative branch of this Government, and I thought that the courtesy and amity and good-fellowship that ought to obtain, and does obtain, among civilized nations would indicate to us the propriety of treating that protest with all deference and due consideration; but, in spite of that protest, courteous, dignified, couched in the most polite and diplomatic language, we are proceeding to consider this bill, affecting as it is alleged the vital interests of Nicaragua, as if it were not made.

I think that an investigation of the provisions of the bill will justify the averment set up in this protest of Mr. Rodriguez, the minister plenipotentiary of the Greater Republic of Central America; and in the course of my argument I shall attempt to make that point plain.

In the consideration of this bill very important and grave considerations present themselves to the Senate of the United States. The first question presented is as to the constitutionality of the bill in two aspects; the second question is as to whether or not this bill affects, injuriously and detrimentally to the interests of Nicaragua, the concessions under which the canal in question is to be constructed; the third question, and one of great moment, is whether or not this bill does not affect and violate the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and a fourth, a most important material question, is whether or not the bill does not contemplate the construction of the canal on a plan impracticable, unsafe, and uncertain.

In every direction this bill presents difficulties of a very serious character, and it will not do to hurry through a measure of this importance without the gravest and calmest deliberation. Any bill which involves $100,000,000 as a subsidy, whether by way of guaranty of the bonds of the subsidized company or by a direct subsidy, will necessarily gather to its support very powerful influences. All the difficulties in the way are brushed aside as mere cobwebs, and a rosy picture of connecting the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans, captivating to the imagination, deluding to the judgment, is presented to the Senate of the United States as a set-off, as an argument, against the exceeding great difficulties presented by the provisions of this bill.

Those of us, Mr. President, who oppose this bill do not do so in any captious spirit. We do not oppose this bill because we do not desire these great oceans to be linked together by the artificial work of this Government; we do not do so because we do not desire the Pacific Coast to be linked to the Atlantic, and the interchange of products between those two portions of our country to be made at the lowest possible cost of transportation; we do not do so because we think in the nature of things this route is impracticable; but we do so because we think that $100,000,000, to be derived by taxation from the people, will be recklessly squandered if appropriated according to the provisions of this bill; the concession violated; the Clayton-Bulwer treaty set aside.

Sir, personally—and I believe I can voice the judgment of all those of us who oppose this bill—I am most earnestly in favor of the construction of an interoceanic waterway between the Pacific and the Atlantic at or about the locality where this canal is proposed to be constructed; but a work of this magnitude, the most colossal, gigantic piece of civil engineering which was ever heard of in the world, encountering difficulties which nowhere else exist even in its mechanical and engineering aspects, requires at our hands a very patient and industrious investigation.

Mr. President, what are the points made by Mr. Rodriguez in regard to the provisions of these bills—this bill, if you choose—especially as affecting the concessions of Nicaragua to the original Construction Company? There were three companies. They are or were all composed of the same individuals. The original concessions of 1887 were made to a voluntary association of individuals, called the Canal Association of Nicaragua. That association transferred over its concessions, obtained by and through Mr. Menocal, to the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company, a corporation of the State of Colorado. That corporation in due time transferred its rights, derived by the original concessionaire, to the present Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, incorporated under an act of Congress. So we have a chain of title as thus stated.

Going back to the protest, I will read what Mr. Rodriguez says, under date of January 15, 1897:

> The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Greater Republic of Central America, has the honor to address His Excellency the Secretary of State, informing him that, as several bills relative to the construction of an interoceanic canal through Nicaragua have been for some time pending before both Houses of the American Congress, his Government recently instructed him to examine them and to make, under certain conditions, suitable representations to His Excellency the Secretary of State.
> The undersigned has consequently examined said bills, which are five in number, to wit:
>
> Three introduced in the House of Representatives, one by Mr. MAHON, December 3, 1895, another by Mr. DOOLITTLE, and the third by Mr. BARHAM, both the latter having been introduced December 6, 1895.
>
> Two introduced in the Senate, one by Mr. PERKINS, December 30, 1895, and the other by Mr. MORGAN, June 1, 1896.
>
> All these bills take it for granted, with minor differences of detail, that the American Government is to take an important part in the enterprise, and that it is to furnish the money necessary for the construction of the canal by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, whose constitution and organization they essentially modify.
> Unfortunately, the undersigned observes that the provisions of these bills are at variance, both generally and in matters of detail, with the stipulations of the contract of April 24, 1887, between Nicaragua and the company aforesaid, from which contract the company derives its existence, and which is the basis of its enterprise.
> That contract stipulates in its eighth article that the concession therein provided for shall in no case be transferable to governments or to foreign public powers, and Article LIII provides that any contravention of this stipulation shall entail a forfeiture of the contract. As it can not be denied that the bills to which the undersigned has reference—although they do not expressly say so—effect that transfer most fully, making the Government of the United States of America the absolute owner of the enterprise and of the canal and its rights, the result to which they inevitably conduce is the forfeiture of the contract.

Mr. President, that is as clear and as lucid a statement of the case against this bill as anyone can possibly make. Under the eighth article of the treaty of cession, referred to in the protest, he says the concessionaire company or association is absolutely inhibited from transferring over their franchises and rights and immunities, which they enjoy under the cession, to any foreign power whatever. What does this bill provide? It provides that 70 per cent of the stock shall be held by the United States. It provides that the majority of the directors shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. There could be no higher evidence of the character in which this bill is viewed by its drafters as a governmental enterprise than by appointing these directors as officers of the United States, to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

No one can conceive of any greater ownership of a corporation than to own the majority of its stock. But, Mr. President, besides stipulating for seven-tenths of the stock to be held by the United States, there is in one of the sections of this bill, to which I need not refer particularly now, a right upon the part of the United States to have a mortgage upon the canal and all its appliances and appurtenances, and that this mortgage shall be executed and foreclosed by the Attorney-General without the necessity of resorting to judicial proceedings before a court. Here is a majority of the stock held, here is a mortgage given to indemnify the United States on its guaranty of these bonds which covers the whole canal and all its franchises. It goes without saying, Mr. President, that if this enterprise were pushed to completion and this canal were finally constructed this mortgage would have to be foreclosed and that the property would fall into the hands of the United States, if such were permitted, or if such could be done under the terms of the stipulations between Nicaragua and the original concessionaires.

So here we have the full indicia of ownership; we have the whole panoply of a full-armed and complete authority and jurisdiction on the part of the United States over this canal. The United States, to all intents and purposes, according to the provisions of this bill, is the owner of the Nicaraguan Canal to be constructed. Can there be two opinions, therefore, as to whether the provisions of the bill are antagonistic to and in violation of the prohibition contained in the cessions from Nicaragua, that no foreign power can ever have the ownership of this canal by transfer?

Why, Mr. President, the mere formality of a transfer is set aside in this bill. What is the use of going through the empty formality of a transfer? Take it out of hand, gobble it all up, do not wait for any cession from the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, but just simply by a bill envelop the canal and take all its franchises. Can anybody say, in the teeth of these cessions, in the teeth of the provisions of this bill, which are diametrically and clearly opposed to the cession, that the United States has not by undertaking to pass this bill, put itself in an attitude of violating the contracts between Nicaragua and the original concessionaires?

It was entirely proper, entirely just, in accordance with the rights of Nicaragua, in accordance with diplomatic usage, that the minister of Nicaragua should make this courteous protest against the action of the United States as contemplated in this bill. Wherefore, then, was it that this minister was arraigned before this Senate as misrepresenting Nicaragua?

I was charmed, Mr. President, by the expressions which fell from the lips of the venerable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is soon to be the first dignitary in the Cabinet of the incoming Administration. I was glad to hear fall from his lips those conservative words, which look toward maintaining the entente cordiale that ought to exist between the United States and this weak Republic to the south of us.

He said as follows:

> The minister of the Greater Republic of Central America sends us a friendly message; he delivers it to the proper authority, the Secretary of State. The President has acknowledged him as the minister plenipotentiary from those powers; he communicates in due form with the Secretary of State, and that statement made by him has all the marks of friendship and of honesty. There is no such sign about it as my friend the Senator from Alabama thinks there is. I see nothing in the communication but what is friendly. The minister himself says that the work can not be completed by the corporation, but that it must be completed, if at all, by the United States of America, and he comes here and submits the matter to us. The communication came in the ordinary course of business transactions. It came to me as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations from the Secretary of State, and the very first thing I did was to show it to the Senator from Alabama, because, having charge of this bill, I felt he ought to know about it. We consulted and talked about it, and the Senator made no objection at all to the communication, so far as I could see, but advised that it be presented to the Senate. It was right that it should be presented in open session; it did not relate to any matter of foreign negotiation; it was not executive business; it was simply in relation to a bill pending before us and under debate, and therefore, although I disliked very much the aspect of it and some of the minister's objections to the bill, I considered it my duty to present it here in open session, and it was properly here. The considerations therein stated by the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America ought to have been treated with kindness and forbearance; it ought to have been and was printed and considered in our debates.
>
> But my honorable friend drew England into the controversy; and whenever there is a bugaboo to be presented, England is brought before us. The Senate of the United States does not fear England or any other power, and the people of the United States do not fear England. We have had two wars with England, long since past, and I hope that war with England will never occur again. The two nations ought never to fight each other. They ought always to be friendly. Great Britain is more and more following the example of the American people of having a government for the people, of the people, and by the people, and I believe the time is not far distant when the people of Great Britain will be as free as we are. In many of their late proceedings they have been approaching nearer and nearer to the rule of the people in their country, and, but for the Irish question, I have no doubt that they would approach much nearer. That, however, is a question that we have not to deal with.
> I think, under all the circumstances, although I will vote for this bill in any form in which it is likely to be presented—I think the better course for my honorable friend to pursue would be to allow the bill to rest. It can not pass during the present session of Congress. Everybody knows, without going into details, that even if the bill should pass the Senate, in all probability it would not be taken up in the House of Representatives. It can be taken up and considered at the next Congress whenever it shall meet.
>
> I would not take advantage of the company which have undertaken to build this canal. I would pay back to them every dollar they have expended in advance for improvements made in the harbor, in the towns adjoining the canal, and in all parts of the work.
> I should be very glad to see another treaty made between Nicaragua and the United States which would provide for the completion of the canal, something that would be acceptable to the United States Government, and that we should proceed to deal with that canal precisely as we have dealt with the great canal upon Lake Superior and the other public works of our country.

Now, Mr. President, I consider that statement of the distinguished Senator from Ohio as embodying not only a correct perception of the proper course to be pursued in a matter of that sort, highly honorable to him in relation to the exalted position which he is to assume, but as embodying other statements and other facts equally pertinent to the consideration of the provisions of this bill. I am very glad to hear the honorable Senator say that all this talk about the interference of England, about the sinister designs of England, about her land-grabbing and canal-grabbing capacity, upon any and every occasion, is altogether extraneous, altogether out of place in any proper issue before the Senate of the United States.

Let the matter be tariff, the English free traders are at work. Let the matter be finances, the English goldbugs are at work. Let the matter be whether or not a company ought to be subsidized by the United States to the enormous extent of $100,000,000 without any sort of guaranty, England is at work. I am very glad to see that the honorable and distinguished Senator from Ohio has got on a plane of thought and feeling elevated above all such petty arguments and considerations.

Another statement that he made in the extract from his speech, which I have quoted has with me, and it always had with me, very great weight and consideration as connected with this enterprise, and that is that it ought to be constructed under another cession from Nicaragua on the lines of the Zavala-Frelinghuysen treaty, and that it ought to be constructed by the Government, if it is constructed at all, and not by and through the intervention of a private corporation. I am very glad to be in accord with the distinguished Senator on this ground, and I yield to him my hearty thanks for the dignified manner in which he stated that he did not think the representations of the minister plenipotentiary of a nation with which we are at peace ought to be treated in other than the most kindly and courteous manner.

Mr. President, I have said that the terms of the cession of Nicaragua to the original canal association were violated by the provisions of this bill providing for the holding by the United States of a majority of the stock, and providing for the foreclosure of a mortgage which would, if foreclosed, inevitably bring to the United States the full ownership of this property, for they necessarily would be at the foreclosure sale the purchaser of the property mortgaged. In order to cover not only the defects in the bill in regard to the inhibition of transferring the franchises of the canal company to a foreign power, but in all other respects where the bill violates the provisions of the cession from Nicaragua, the distinguished Senator from Alabama has offered a number of amendments. The amendments are in the shape of additional sections to his amended bill, and I will read section 18:

> That of the $100,000,000 of capital herein provided for, at least 5 per cent shall be reserved for Central American Governments and citizens that may desire to subscribe for the same within a time to be fixed by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.
> That there shall be delivered to the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica such portions of the securities authorized to be issued by the provisions of this act as they, or either of them, are entitled to receive by virtue of the concessions now existing from such States, or either of them, to said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.
>
> Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as empowering the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua to accept any rights or privileges or to do any act or thing inconsistent with the terms of the concessions made to it by the Nicaraguan Government or the Government of Costa Rica; and the Government of the United States admits the right of Nicaragua and Costa Rica to interpose any objections to the acceptance of this act by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua which they, or either of them, may deem just, subject to the right of the United States to participate in the examination, discussion, and settlement of such objections by diplomatic correspondence or by arbitration under the provisions of the concessions made by said Governments to said company, if that method of settlement is preferred by said Governments.

If there were any proof needed beyond the terms of the original bill to show that the United States has absorbed the Maritime Canal Company, that that company has virtually disappeared and the great Government of the United States is substituted for it, it is these amendments. They direct that the company shall do so and so. In the first place, they direct that 5 per cent of the securities provided for shall be allowed to be subscribed for by the citizens of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. That is an obligation on the part of the Maritime Canal Company. Not only has the United States absorbed all the power and privileges and franchises of this corporation, but it now comes in as a custodian, as a guardian, as a tutor of the company, and directs what it shall do. It takes virtual control not only of the original franchises of the canal but of the Maritime Canal Company itself in what it ought to do.

In trying to escape from the attack of Minister Rodriguez that a certain percentage of the securities which Nicaragua and Costa Rica were entitled to had not been given to them or they had not been permitted to subscribe to them by the Maritime Canal Company, the United States comes in and assumes to do that, and in trying to escape from the attack of the minister in this regard in the matter of the violation of the cession on the part of this company in respect to the stock, it does what? It falls into the other violation, and a greater violation, of assuming absolute control, absolute dictation, absolute ownership not only of the canal, but of the Maritime Company itself. The honorable Senator from Alabama was between Scylla and Charybdis. When he dodged or attempted to dodge or to evade the force of this attack in regard to certain provisions, he fell into its hands in regard to the more vital and important attack made as to the ownership by the United States of the franchises of the canal. There shall be delivered from the United States to the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica such portions of the securities authorized to be issued by the provisions of this act. It is mandatory, authoritative; the language of a dictator; the language of a powerful government. What right has the United States to intervene as a Government between Nicaragua and a party with whom she has contracted for the construction of the canal?

When the United States intervenes in this manner in this authoritative way, the United States becomes amenable, becomes directly liable to the charge of ownership and possession which the minister makes against the United States in this first and most vital attack that he has made. Sir, we are proceeding as if neither Nicaragua nor the Maritime Canal Company, for that matter, had any rights in the matter. Either one of two things in regard to this matter is true. Either the United States is proceeding in the matter with its full power and force, or it is merely giving advice. If the United States is proceeding with full authority and power and force, compelling obedience to what it says, then the United States is not only the owner of the franchises of the canal company, but the dictator to Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company alike, and this amendment very kindly says that if any matters of difference between Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua arise and are submitted to arbitration under a certain article of the cessions, the United States will come in, and, if Nicaragua or either of the parties prefers it, she will act as arbitrator and she will undertake to carry on the diplomatic intercourse as a nation.

There can be and there has not been any answer to the charge of Minister Rodriguez that the bill violates the provisions of the cession from Nicaragua to this company when that cession says that no transfer of the franchises and the canal shall be made to a foreign government. Right here I can stop and give a good reason why Nicaragua made this stipulation. In reading the articles of this cession or agreement one is struck with the sedulous care that Nicaragua takes to neutralize the canal. One is struck with the sedulous care that it takes even with regard to itself, for it is stipulated that the shares or securities, in whatsoever shape they may be, that Nicaragua is to receive in consideration of the cession are to be nontransferable by herself. She stipulates that she herself will not put it into the power of a foreign government, so far as she is concerned, and so far as her shares in the enterprise go, to have any control over the canal. It is not necessary to point out at the present moment the particular article in which the statement is made that Nicaragua herself shall not transfer her shares. Later on in the discourse, if occasion demands, I will refer to it.

Mr. President, these cessions provide that the books shall be open for the subscription of stock in the enterprise, so that all people and all nations may participate in the construction of this great work, and in other provisions Nicaragua guarantees that the canal, so far as she is concerned, so far as her jurisdiction goes, shall be neutralized. I have referred to one particular, but there are other clauses and stipulations of the cessions which point in the same direction. The neutrality of the canal was amply provided for and securely guarded in the clause which prohibits the transfer of the canal and its franchises to a foreign government. That was evidently put in there for the purpose of making the canal a grand international waterway. It was put in there for the purpose of preventing any powerful nation or any combination of nations from taking exclusive control and jurisdiction of the great waterway, and in the teeth of this safeguard, which the prudence and wisdom of Nicaragua dictated, the pending bill provides for the virtually exclusive ownership and control of the canal by the Government of the United States. And I consider that the most vital point in this enterprise.

I was instructed and impressed with the powerful argument made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] yesterday in regard to the absolute necessity for the neutrality of the canal. I believe it is an international necessity that the canal shall be neutralized, and I believe that this very important inhibition against a transfer of the canal to a foreign power was placed in there by Nicaragua with a full view and apprehension of the great necessity that the great waterway, opening the secrets of the straits, a great waterway which ought not to be embarrassed or impeded in any way by the exclusive control of any nation, should be absolutely neutral, absolutely free to every nation, to every ship that sails the oceans.

Right at the inception of this argument we are met with an insuperable objection, one that I think is absolutely condemnatory of the bill and absolutely destructive of its provisions. No one can read the provisions of the bill and come from the reading of them without saying that not only are the provisions designed, but they effectually accomplish the work of transferring the cession from Nicaragua to construct the canal from the Maritime Canal Company to the United States.

This minister goes on, after referring to the first vital point, to allude to Article XLVII of the cessions, as to which I will frankly say I do not entirely agree in the criticisms of the representative from Nicaragua, and he says:

> Article XLVII of that instrument provides that the company shall undertake, at its own expense, the final surveys of the ground and the location of the line of the canal by a commission of competent engineers, two of whom are to be appointed by the Government of Nicaragua, and the aforesaid Article LIII provides that a failure to comply with this stipulation shall entail the forfeiture of the concession. The bills, however, provide that the canal shall be constructed under the surveillance of the Department of Engineers of the Army of the United States of America, and according to its plans; and that three engineers shall be designated by the President for that purpose, who shall make the explorations and estimates. This provision likewise conduces to the forfeiture of the contract.

There have been a great many surveys of the canal. The chief engineer of the company purports to have made, I think, two exhaustive surveys. The first survey of the route, so far as it appears in any statement of an authoritative character, was made by a celebrated and competent engineer in 1851, for the benefit of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, who at that time contemplated making a waterway across the Isthmus for the benefit of his California trade. Mr. Menocal made, under the direction of the United States, a survey of this route in 1885. He again made a survey in 1889. He purports to have made other surveys or continual surveys in the interim between 1889 and 1890. But, sir, it occurs to me that while the bill provides for the surveillance by the United States Engineer Corps of the construction of the canal, it does not provide for the survey and location of the route. If the survey and location of the route has not been made, the canal company has no standing in court at all. It is stated by and on behalf of the Maritime Canal Company that a full plan and profile map and drawings of the survey of 1889, made by Mr. Menocal, have been deposited with the Nicaraguan authorities, in compliance with this provision of the concession.

Sir, it is one of two things. If no survey has been made, if the statements of the Maritime Canal Company and Mr. Menocal are not true, we are wasting our breath in talking about this enterprise. But I rather suppose that the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America, representing Nicaragua, has made a mistake between the survey of the route and the survey that is necessary in the construction of that route by a corps of engineers.

However that may be, that is a point which might have been condoned by the Nicaraguan Government by acquiescence. These bills have been pending for a long time. The report of the engineers has been made public. The report of the survey is authentic so far as anything can be made authentic of a character of this kind. It has the stamp of being official. It has been published by the Secretary of the Interior according to the provisions of the original bill, and I rather think this point, although it appears upon its face to have some merit, is not very strong.

Then the minister goes on and says:

> The people of all nations shall be invited to contribute—

Quoting from the concessions—

> The people of all nations shall be invited to contribute the necessary capital to the enterprise.
> Of the capital with which the company shall organize, and which it proposes to distribute among the different countries interested in the enterprise, there shall be reserved at least 5 per cent for the Central American Government and citizens that may desire to subscribe.

Who shall reserve them? The Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, not the United States. The Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua has not reserved the 5 per cent stipulated to be reserved in this clause of the article of the concession; and in that particular I think the criticism of the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America is well made. They have no right to look to the United States for the performance of the contract upon the part of the Maritime Canal Company holding these concessions by transfer. They must look to the company bound, legally bound, to them, with whom they contracted either directly or indirectly. They contracted with the officers of this company, and as a matter of course this company taking the concession takes all the obligations of the original concessionaires. Here is an obligation that has not been complied with. Here is a reservation of 5 per cent of the stock that would have to be made, and they have distributed the stock in utter disregard of this stipulation.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to ask the Senator if he has discovered in any of the documents the charter of the Nicaragua Canal Association or the resolution or action of that body transferring their concession from Nicaragua to the Maritime Canal Company? If he will allow me to explain my question, it will be observed that the concession of Nicaragua is to Mr. Menocal, as representing the Nicaragua Canal Association, but I have not been able to discover in the documents which are laid before us any charter of the Nicaragua Canal Association, or to deduce title by any finding of the documents or resolutions of that association to the Maritime Canal Company.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will answer the Senator from Virginia by stating that I have never seen, although I have diligently searched, any written transfer or any other transfer from the original company or association to the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company, and from that company to the present company; but I have seen in the testimony of the then president of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, taken before a House committee and lately published in a House document, in the oral testimony of the then president, who was Mr. Hitchcock, that the original association had transferred over its franchises to the Canal Construction Company, and that the Canal Construction Company had, by a resolution of its board, which I did not see, transferred here all its rights to the present company. That is all I know about it. But I have seen nowhere any transfer of an authentic or a private character.

Now, how does the amendment of the bill get over this criticism of the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America?

"The capital stock of the final company shall be composed of shares, bonds, or obligations of any other kind, in such proportion as it may deem convenient."

This is another provision of the ninth article. The bills, however, fix the amount of the capital stock in shares, of which they dispose in such a way that they are of no use for the work of the enterprise, as they ought to be, according to the intent of the contract. For the work of the enterprise the bills create bonds, which must thus be converted into capital stock or be left out of the contract. The undersigned need not here point out the infractions which the bills involve.

This criticism is well directed. The article referred to mentions provision for the capital stock of this enterprise which may be used in the construction of the canal, and the provisions of the bill transfer the stock over to the United States, to Costa Rica, to Nicaragua, to such persons as may be indicated by the Maritime Canal Company, and to no others. They make distribution. There is no provision whatever in the pending bill to distribute any of these bonds to Nicaragua. The bill contemplates that the construction of the canal shall be by the proceeds derived from the sale of bonds. Not one single one of these bonds is to be given to Nicaragua. Now, sir, what are the plain directions of this contract?

The capital stock of the final company shall be composed of shares, bonds, or obligations of any other kind, in such proportion as it may deem convenient. The issue and transfer of these obligations shall be exempt from stamp dues and from any other imposts or taxes established, or that may be hereafter established, in the Republic.

Of the capital with which the company shall organize, and which it proposes to distribute among the different countries interested in the enterprise, there shall be reserved at least 5 per cent for the Central American Governments and citizens that may desire to subscribe.

What do you call the capital of this company? What is the capital that is to be used in the construction of this canal? Ordinarily, when a joint stock company is organized, the loans of money are made upon a pledge of stock, or upon such other securities as the company may possess or may derive, but the stock issued to the United States, the stock distributed around by the provisions of the bill, is to be nonassessable. That is not the capital stock. That represents nothing. No money can be raised on it, nor can the canal be constructed out of it.

As the minister says, when this per cent is stipulated for all the shares, bonds, stock, or other securities that the company has, what does it mean? The Senator from Alabama the other day said that if there were five different sorts of securities, and you have got 6 per cent of each one of the securities, you have 30 per cent of the whole, when under the concession you were entitled to only 6 per cent. Is that true? Nicaragua ought to have, under the terms of the concession, 6 per cent of all the stock, shares, bonds, or obligations, of whatever character they may be. Where is the 6 per cent of the bonds? The company takes the whole $100,000,000 of bonds, sells the bonds with the guaranty of the United States on them, and uses that money for the construction of the canal. The canal is, at the lowest estimate ever put upon it, to cost over $100,000,000. That is the lowest estimate ever put upon it by impartial men. In the matter of the estimates of Mr. Menocal, I have to take them with many grains of allowance. He has estimated too much; he has estimated too often; and his estimates differ from one another too much to be the foundation of any clear judgment as to the cost of the construction of this canal.

But be that as it may, sir, 6 per cent of the bonds, the capital with which the company is to construct this work, is to be set over to the Republic of Nicaragua. Has it been done? Does not the bill in terms almost provide that it shall not be done? When these bonds are to be delivered over to the Maritime Canal Company they do not make a solitary provision for the transfer of one of them to the Republic of Nicaragua.

And what about these amendments? Can the Government of the United States coerce the Maritime Canal Company? The bonds of the United States will be given to the company with the guaranty of the United States on them. They will dispose of the bonds at not less than par. I suppose they will go to a premium. They ought to go as high as bonds sold to get gold to replenish the Treasury. They ought to go to 117; they ought to go higher. When these bonds get into the possession of the Maritime Canal Company, unless it is acknowledged here and now in the course of this debate that the United States and the Maritime Canal Company are one and the same, that the United States has absorbed and swallowed up and digested the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, then there is no guarantee whatever that the stipulation made in the contract with Nicaragua, the original concessionaire, will be carried out and performed.

It is hard enough, Mr. President, for the United States to comply with its own contracts. It is rather a novel departure from the ordinary course of affairs and business relations of the United States that she will not only guarantee the bonds of a private corporation, but that she will undertake stipulations in regard to the performance of the duty of that corporation and its legal liabilities in every quarter and in every direction, in every shape and form that they may take. We not only come in and guarantee these bonds, but here is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama which undertakes in a mild, pleasant kind of a way, in a persuasive kind of a way, to make the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua do its duty in regard to transferring these bonds; but I see no power that the United States could exercise in this regard except the power of main force—the main force which is talked of here in the concessions later on in regard to another matter. I see no power by and on behalf of the United States except a persuasive power, an advisory power, to compel the performance of the stipulation between the United States and the original concessionaires. So if that point is well taken and the canal company has violated this provision, in the language of the minister, this violation conduces to the forfeiture of this contract.

Here is a criticism which I think, taken in connection with the surveys and estimates of the chief engineer of that company, has great weight and significance. I think it will disclose very clearly in such a way that even the most devoted adherent to the construction of the canal under and according to the terms of the bill will halt a while before he will give his vote for the passage of the pending measure:

The company, by Article XIV of the aforesaid contract, has contracted the solemn obligation to construct at its own expense within the term of three years, reckoned from the commencement of the work upon the interoceanic canal, a navigable canal between Lake Managua and the navigable part of the Tipitapa River, near Pasquier, of sufficient dimensions to admit of the free passage of vessels drawing 6 feet and of 150 feet in length.

Mr. President, there has been no estimate made for the construction of the canal here referred to. It has been entirely disregarded. In the report of the Ludlow commission it is not adverted to. Mr. Menocal himself fails to state in his estimate what the canal will cost. It is made a very important part of the concession from Nicaragua to the original company and association. Managua is the capital city of that Republic. In the construction of this great work that Republic took care that its capital city should be in direct water communication with the canal to be constructed, and therefore it was that this provision was inserted. No one can say it is not of vital importance and necessity, in view of the construction and completion of this canal, that this city of Managua, which I am told is a very beautiful city, should not be in direct communication with it.

The three years have long since passed. Not a single effort has been made even in the direction of estimating the cost of this enterprise, and the minister from Central America draws the attention of the United States to the fact that in this important particular concerning his Government, concerning the Government of Nicaragua, the canal company has failed in the performance of its duty.

Mr. President, when such a statement as that is made, when it is made one of the conditions upon which the existence of this contract of cession depends, I ask, Does it become the Senate of the United States to be undertaking to pass a bill, or even to discuss a bill, which looks toward the construction of a work the time for the completion of which depends upon the performance of such a stipulation as this, and the stipulation has not been performed? Are we, as a nation self-respecting, honoring other nations and claiming their honor in return, claiming to be irreproachable in all of our obligations of an international character—are we to take up this violated treaty of cession—call it a treaty—are we to take up a contract violated in almost every important part, and undertake its execution by our own instrumentality, by our own great power and resources, in the face of a protest of this kind and in face of a violation of this kind? It occurs to me that the Senator from Ohio was entirely correct and met the decencies and proprieties of the situation when he said we ought to stop.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chilton,	Lodge,	Pugh,
Allen,	Clark,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Bacon,	Cullom,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Martin,	Thurston,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Tillman,
Blanchard,	Gear,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Burrows,	Gordon,	Murphy,	Vilas,
Butler,	Gorman,	Nelson,	Walthall,
Caffery,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Wetmore,
Cannon,	Hill,	Pasco,	White.
Carter,	Hoar,	Peffer,
Chandler,	Lindsay,	Perkins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, there are two other points to which the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America has directed the attention of the Senate. This bill provides for 11 directors, 8 of whom are to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate. He says that in the concessions there is a stipulation that 6 of the directors of the company to be formed for the construction of this canal shall be taken from the promoters, and that this provision has been set aside by the pending bill. Upon the face of the bill his criticism is correct. The President is allowed unlimited discretion as to the selection of the directors; he is not to be bound by these cessions; in fact, the bill itself utterly ignores the cessions. The President is, therefore, to take these directors from any body of men or from any locality in the United States that he sees fit. This is made by the minister a very serious criticism.

What the particular purpose or motive of Nicaragua may have been in inserting this provision I am not aware; but here is the provision. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that a provision of like character was in the cession from Costa Rica, but that the cession from Costa Rica only made provision that the first board should be chosen from the promoters; that this cession from Costa Rica had some sort of effect, I believe he stated, upon the subsequent cession from Nicaragua, and that Nicaragua was presumed to have intended that these promotors should only form the directorate for the first board. But, at all events, it is upon the face of the papers in the cession from Nicaragua that the directorate for the canal, for the company of execution, which is this Maritime Canal Company, shall be taken largely from the promoters, six of the directors, and that provision has been ignored, has been evaded, has been set aside, as if it did not exist.

Every single one of these stipulations of Nicaragua in this cession is to be observed to the letter. It can not be set up that this, that, or the other condition or stipulation made by Nicaragua in her own behalf, for her own purposes, should be considered immaterial. We are not to sit in judgment upon the motives of a State in the matter of her concessions. We are not to say that it is immaterial to inquire whether a canal construction company would be better off with a directorate taken from the promoters rather than from a body of citizens of the United States. That is not the question. The question is, Did Nicaragua insert in her concession such a clause as that, and has that clause been observed? If it has not been observed, it is a cause of forfeiture of the contract.

Mr. TURPIE. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. TURPIE. I regard the clause inserted in respect to the appointment of promoters to be in addition to the clause preventing the transfer to foreign governments. I ask the opinion of the honorable Senator on that point. I wish to know whether he does not think that this section in the original treaty of cession is provided in addition to and in aid of that section which prevents the transfer of these rights to any foreign government or public state?

I regard the provisions respecting the conditions of the cession in relation to the promoters to be in aid of that, and to prevent also perpetually the transfer of it from the original promoters for all time, keeping it in the hands of the corporators, and preventing it from going into the hands of any government or public state.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am very much obliged to my friend for the suggestion he has made. It is very pertinent, and it lays down the very motive, in my opinion, of the Republic of Nicaragua in requiring that at least six of this board of directors should be the promoters of the canal company.

Mr. MORGAN. What would be the state of affairs fifty years from now, when all the promoters may be dead?

Mr. CAFFERY. Well, I find that in this world it is as much as we can do to take care of the present. In matters that can regulate themselves in fifty years, or as to what may occur in fifty years, I do not think we should concern ourselves. Some of these gentlemen may be then octogenarians, or they may live one hundred and fifty years, for aught I know; but whether they do or not, this is a stipulation in præsenti; it relates to the present; it relates to the formation of this board of directors. Therefore, so far as the limits of human life are concerned in this generation of living men now, the Republic of Nicaragua has taken care that these franchises shall not be transferred to a foreign country by this clause. What may occur in the future I do not know; but it is to be hoped that the purposes of Nicaragua in this requirement will be followed out in future boards if this canal is ever to be built. It is to be hoped that any future directorate which may be appointed in after times will be appointed in pursuance of the same spirit which prompted Nicaragua to require that six of the directorate of this company should be taken from the promoters.

But there is another stipulation in my opinion of equal moment. It is a stipulation of time. It is stated that from and after the date of these cessions, some time in April, 1887, in ten years after the date of the cession if the canal were not completed then the cessions lapsed and the grant fell. I understood, in a colloquy which occurred between the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] when he was addressing the Senate on this question, that the honorable Senator from Alabama said that the time of the limit of ten years was extended two years; that instead of commencing from April, 1887, the ten years commenced from October, 1889.

It is stated by the chief engineer of this canal company that it can not be possibly constructed under six years. If the United States, in view of this time limit, which will expire before the six years run out, undertook to construct this canal, and about the time they have it half completed, or nearly completed, the Republic of Nicaragua were to demand a compliance with this forfeiture condition, how would the United States answer it? The Republic of Nicaragua has filed its protest, which was sent to the Secretary of State and communicated by him to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who communicated it to the Senate. We go on to construct this canal in the teeth of the protest; and whether the construction of the Senator from Alabama is correct or not, whether the time limit of ten years commences to run from April, 1887, or October, 1889, taking into consideration that this canal can not be finished under six years, the protest is equally fatal to any attempt on the part of the United States to undertake its construction. Nay, more, Mr. President, it would be infinitely wiser to do nothing in the matter of the construction of this canal, to spend no money upon it, than to undertake its completion and to lose our money when we were half through with it.

Could we by "main force," spoken of in this time limit, disregard the rights of Nicaragua in the premises and undertake to hold the canal? I think not. I do not predicate the action of the United States upon any resort to force or violence of any kind.

In the testimony delivered before the select committee of the House of Representatives, called the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, it was stated that this time limit would not give opportunity to build the canal if the financial panic of 1893 was not considered a matter of "main force." It is prudently and wisely stipulated in connection with this time limit that if matters of "main force" intervene, the time of the intervention of this force shall not be calculated in the ten years' limit; but who ever heard of a financial panic being a matter of "main force?" Financial panics have occurred in this country at various periods. Did anybody undertake before to hold that an industrial depression or a financial panic was a matter of "main force?" A matter of main force is some physical violence that can not be resisted. It does not refer to the silent but powerful action of economic forces. Whether the panic of 1893 was due to the demonetization of silver, as our silver friends urge, or whether it was due purely to industrial causes, no one can say that there was any consideration of any element of "main force" or physical obstacle.

Sir, the very terms of this concession stipulate only for "main force," and it would be exceedingly strange for the ingenious gentlemen who stand behind this great enterprise to interpolate as "main force" a mere matter of the silent, powerful, unseen action of economic forces. Financial panics have nothing to do with it. We had a panic in 1837, when we had too much money; we had a panic in 1857—we had too much speculation; we had a panic in 1873—we had too much speculation; we had a panic in 1893—some say we had too much money and some say too little, but there was no question of "main force."

Mr. MORGAN. Where does the Senator find the statement about main force?

Mr. CAFFERY. In the time-limit stipulation.

Mr. MORGAN. In what article?

Mr. VILAS. The forty-eighth article.

Mr. MORGAN. I should be glad if the Senator would read it.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will read it. It is as follows:

A term of ten years is also granted to the company for the construction, completion, and opening of the canal for maritime navigation. However, should events of main force arise, duly justified and sufficient to impede the regular progress of the works during the period of the said ten years, an extension shall be granted equal in duration to the time that may have been lost by such delays.

Here is another part of the article which I did not advert to:

If, at the expiration of the ten years aforesaid, the works should not be completed so as to have the maritime communication between the two oceans opened, in consideration of the great capital the company may have invested in the enterprise, and of the good will and ability it may have shown, and the difficulties encountered, the Republic binds itself to concede a new extension.

"In consideration of the great capital the company may have invested in the enterprise." Here is an enterprise, which their own engineer states will cost $65,000,000, that the consulting board of engineers in New York called the Bogart board, called in to supervise the estimates made by Mr. Menocal, placed at $87,000,000. The estimates made by the Ludlow commission are one hundred and thirty-three and a half million dollars, or thereabouts, and here is a company which has constructed this canal to an extent and to an outlay the present value of which is estimated at about $500,000. According to their own testimony they have not spent on this canal over $3,000,000, and we have now, here in 1897, the term of this contract to expire in April next, with a mile and a half of canal constructed, with a railroad with rotten ties and grown over with weeds, bramble, and wild cane, the cars of which are propelled by poles, the harbor that they attempted to dredge out filled up—here is the great capital invested and the great work done, in consideration of which the State of Nicaragua says they may concede an extension of time.

Mr. VILAS. The Ludlow board says it is three-quarters of a mile.

Mr. CAFFERY. I think it is stated by the engineer of the company that they dug a mile and a half of the canal on the sea level; but that canal was to be dug, I remind my friend the Senator from Wisconsin, to the depth of 28 feet, and it is only 17 feet. It has not been done much more than half. You may call it, if you please, three-quarters of a mile, because it is a mile and a half half done. I do not believe that the Maritime Canal Company, as modest as it is, as coy as it is, would have the audacity to say that in consideration of the great capital invested they ought to have an extension of time from the Republic of Nicaragua.

The canal company started out with a great many rosy anticipations. They have constantly said that they were not applying to Congress; and the other day, in the discussion of a part of this subject, I heard the venerable and honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] say that we had run after the Maritime Canal Company, or we had sought them. Oh, sir, what an elusive company it is that we can only catch with $100,000,000 of bonds! They do protest too much. They are a little too coy. They have never asked the United States for anything, they say, and whatever is given is thrust upon them as an unsought gift by the United States.

When it comes to the time limit, can anybody say, when the facts are so well known and established, when there has been comparatively nothing done in the construction of the canal, that there can be any extension of time granted upon the part of Nicaragua? No, sir; it can not be said. If, therefore, there is no ground for an extension in consideration of the great capital invested and the great works constructed or the good will and ability that this company has displayed, would it not be the height of folly upon the part of the United States to embark on an enterprise to sink twenty, thirty, forty, fifty—a hundred million dollars—to have it swallowed up by a forfeiture legally demandable under the terms of the time-limit concession? I think there is no sort of doubt on that question.

Mr. President, I stated a while ago that the Republic of Nicaragua has in terms stipulated for the neutrality of the canal. I argued that the stipulations in other respects warranted the conclusion that the main purpose of Nicaragua in making these reservations in her behalf was the neutrality of the canal. I will read Article VI.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

DULUTH AND WINNIPEG RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 121) to amend an act granting to the Duluth and Winnipeg Railroad Company a right of way through the Chippewa and White Earth reservations, in the State of Minnesota. It is a local matter, and will provoke no debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. At the hour of half past 4 the Senate has consented, I believe, to take up all unobjected matters, and it is very near that time now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement, the Chair will state, is to consider House bills and House joint resolutions.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that this is a local matter, and will provoke no discussion.

Mr. MORGAN. I will not object.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, in line 9, after the word "five," to insert "and inserting the words 'or its legal successor, the Duluth, Superior and Western Railroad Company;'" and in line 13, after the word "company," to insert "or its legal successor, the Duluth, Superior and Western Railroad Company;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That section 5 of an act entitled "An act granting to the Duluth and Winnipeg Railroad Company a right of way through the Chippewa and White Earth Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota," approved August 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "five," and inserting the words "or its legal successor, the Duluth, Superior and Western Railroad Company," so that the bill will read:

"SEC. 5. That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company or its legal successor, the Duluth, Superior and Western Railroad Company, unless the road shall be constructed through the said reservations within five years after the passage of this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. The purport of the joint resolution is simply to extend the time two years.

Mr. NELSON. To extend the time for building a road through an Indian reservation.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE AT CHATTANOOGA.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. I ask permission of the Senate to call up the bill (H. R. 9799) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga," giving the said company more time in which to begin and complete said bridge. It will lead to no debate. It merely extends the time within which a railroad may build a bridge. It is a bill similar to the joint resolution just passed.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a House bill?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; and it will take but a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. House bills will be the regular order at half past 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. ISAACS & CO.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the courtesy of the Senate to call up and put on its passage the bill (H. R. 1524) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of William B. Isaacs & Co. It is a bill which, according to my recollection, was objected to the day when unobjected bills were called up, because it would have given rise to debate, perhaps. I do not think there can be any substantial objection to the bill. I ask that it may now be taken up.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill is included in the unanimous-consent agreement for half after 4.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not advert to that fact. If there is objection, I will let it go until then. It might be briefer to pass it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the bill he has indicated may be considered. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish the Senator from Virginia would explain the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. After the war certain banks in Virginia sent their coin to the town of Washington, in Georgia. About $100,000 in gold was among their assets. The Union generals commanding in the South and in Virginia had given to the claimants protection and safe conduct of their money from Washington to the city of Richmond, and en route about the sum named was taken possession of by the Federal troops, and it was covered into the Treasury. A controversy afterwards arose as to the ownership of the coin. Congress passed a joint resolution directing the Court of Claims to ascertain and report who were the owners of the coin in question. They reported that the bank, whose assignees the claimants are—

Was the equitable owner of a part of the fund in the Treasury proportionate to the amount which it contributed thereto, such proportionate part being the sum of $16,997.88. The claim therefor and the right of property therein passed to and is now owned by the claimants in this suit, who are equitably entitled to the same.

The remainder of the fund, being the sum of $78,276.40, is the property of the United States, the title never having passed to said banks and the claimants not having derived any claim or title in and through said judicial proceedings.

Mr. CULLOM. How do William B. Isaacs & Co. happen to be the beneficiaries?

Mr. DANIEL. They are the assignees of the bank.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator know what they paid for the assets?

Mr. DANIEL. No, I do not. I was once upon the Committee on Claims, and I think I drew the original report in the case and had the matter submitted to the Court of Claims. I know the firm very well. I know the members of it. They are very highly reputable people of the city of Richmond, and my impression is that the bank was sold out after the war, and the assets were probably sold at public auction. The money that goes to the United States Government was money which had probably been deposited, if my memory is correct, by the State government of Virginia, and the idea of the court, no doubt, was that it was the money of an enemy. I presume that was it. The court does not say. There is no claimant for the rest of the $100,000. But this money was under the safe conduct of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. Has all the money been turned into the Treasury?

Mr. DANIEL. All of it has been turned into the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the bill (S. 2058) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of William B. Isaacs & Co. be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half past 4 having arrived, under the unanimous consent given by the Senate the Calendar of pension cases will be called. The first pension case on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to inquire if anyone knows of any navigation on the Red River of the North by steam craft or any other sort of vessel?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] can probably tell. There is no doubt but what the bill is all right.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the right to add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved to Congress or to any State which may hereafter be established in the Territory through which the lines of said railroad companies are constructed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 28, after the word "stations," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That any railroad company which shall avail itself of the privileges of this act shall not charge more than 3 cents per mile for carrying each passenger through said Indian Territory.

Mr. CHILTON. I shall vote for the amendment if it is insisted upon. The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I will ask that it may be passed over until I can communicate to the gentlemen who have the management of the bill the fact that such an amendment is pending.

Mr. BERRY. Before the bill goes over, I wish to say a few words, if the Senator from Texas will permit me.

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to state that all the railroads which pass through the territory of the Five Civilized Tribes are allowed to charge only 3 cents a mile with the exception of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas. That road was granted its charter many years ago, and there was no provision of the kind inserted in the original act granting it the right of way through that Territory. All the charters which have since been granted to various railroads have contained provisions that the roads shall not charge a passenger more than 3 cents a mile. The result is that the Missouri, Kansas and Texas charges 3 cents a mile in Missouri and Texas, but the moment it strikes the Indian Territory it charges the inhabitants and citizens there and all persons who pass through the Territory on its road 5 cents a mile.

It is an injustice to those people, and it ought to be remedied. The railroads come here and ask additional privileges of Congress, and I think when they are asking them, they ought to be required to be placed upon the same footing with all other railroads in the Territory.

Mr. CHILTON. There is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Arkansas says. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad has an attorney in this city, and I will ask that the bill may be passed over, in order that I may communicate to him the fact that such an amendment has been offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas will be considered as pending, and the bill will go over.

So as to read:

ST. LOUIS RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 9752) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota," approved April 24, 1894, as amended by an act approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin," was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Wisconsin is opposed to the bill, and I agreed not to call it up in his absence. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 9775) to amend so much of chapter 189 of the Statutes of the United States of America, passed at the third session of the Fifty-third Congress, and approved March 2, 1895, as requires that the lower portion of the Rock Island Bridge shall not be occupied by any street railway company without paying a reasonable rent therefor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF INSPECTORS OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the next two bills on the Calendar, House bill 10067 and House bill 9790, go over. They seem to be important matters.

Mr. NELSON. House bill 10067 is a very short bill, reported from the Committee on Commerce. I wish the Senator would allow it to be proceeded with.

Mr. CARTER. I have no especial objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the objection.

The bill (H. R. 10067) to amend "An act to amend 'An act to amend section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam vessels,' approved August 7, 1882;" and also to amend section 4414, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes, "Regulation of steam vessels," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the last paragraph of section 2, page 399, Supplement to Revised Statutes, volume 2, so as to read:

> Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual and reasonable traveling expenses or mileage, at the rate of 5 cents a mile, incurred in the performance of his duties, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF EASTCHESTER CREEK, NEW YORK.

The bill (H. R. 10012) relating to the improvement of Eastchester Creek, State of New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to expend the whole or any portion of any appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of Eastchester Creek, in the State of New York, in accordance with the surveys and report for such improvement, upon that portion of the improvement included in recent surveys extending the improvement to the head of tide water.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOME IN COLORADO.

Mr. CARTER. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4985) to permit a part of the Fort Lyon Military Reservation to be occupied, improved, and controlled for a soldiers' home by the State of Colorado, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. The bill is unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. TELLER. The bill was first referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and reported back from that committee and sent to the Committee on Public Lands, and it is now reported favorably. I hope it will be put on its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TURPIE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 6, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 5, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I spoke yesterday of having a report, which was made by the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Fifty-first Congress, printed in the RECORD, and I supposed from what I said that it would be printed this morning, although I did not make a formal request to that effect. I now do so; and accompany that request with notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the District appropriation bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report made by the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Fifty-first Congress, with regard to the claims which were under discussion in Committee of the Whole yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to printing that report as a document, but I do object to encumbering the RECORD with it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BENOIT VS. BOATNER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit to the House the report of the Committee on Elections No. 2, in the case of Alexis Benoit vs. Charles J. Boatner. The report is unanimous, and I will not call it up for consideration at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and placed on the House Calendar.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in reference to that case that the chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2 notified me that a meeting of the committee was to be held for the adoption of the report, and I intended to be present, but overlooked it. I have not had an opportunity to examine the report, but knowing that I agree in the conclusions, I merely reserve the right, if I find I do not assent to any of the statements made, to say so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suppose there is no objection to that; at least, not upon my part. The gentleman says that he was notified to attend the meeting.

Mr. BAILEY. I was notified.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. One other gentleman of the minority was notified of the meeting and appeared, and another member, the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] came to the committee room and suggested that the report be made to-day, and that he could hereafter dissent from the reasoning if he cared to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understood that it was to be made at this time.

HOPKINS VS. KENDALL.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report on the contested-election case of Hopkins vs. Kendall, from the State of Kentucky. Seven members agree in this report. Two desire to make a minority report, and ask to be allowed until Wednesday next to file their views.

Mr. ROYSE. That is correct, Mr. Speaker. We expect to be able to file the views of the minority by Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE]?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker. I ask that the report be printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ROYSE. I ask that the views of the minority also, when filed, be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business which has passed through the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will read the first bill.

GEORGE L. BENNER.

The first unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6841) granting a pension to George L. Benner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of George L. Benner and grant him a pension because of a fracture of right thigh, received during the civil war while said Benner was an employee of the Quartermaster's Department; said pension to be rated according to the degree of disability existing as the result of said injury.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan if he has any objection to having the report in that case read to the House before he demands the previous question? This seems to be a bill to pension a civil employee.

The SPEAKER. It is a proposition to pension a civilian.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well, Mr. Speaker. Pending the motion for the previous question, I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MILES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6841) entitled "A bill granting a pension to George L. Benner," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

This is a bill enacting that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of George L. Benner and grant him a pension because of a fracture of the right thigh, received during the civil war while said Benner was an employee of the Quartermaster's Department, to be rated according to the degree of disability existing as the result of said injury.

George L. Benner was a teamster during the war of the rebellion, employed by the United States under Captain Dana, United States Army, an assistant quartermaster; also under a wagon master named Lyles, and was accidentally injured while performing his duties by being caught between the front wheel of an army wagon and a tree, about November 7, 1861, incurring a fracture of the right thigh.

Dr. N. S. Lincoln, surgeon of quartermaster's hospital, testified February 28, 1896, that George L. Benner was admitted to the quartermaster's hospital, under his (Dr. Lincoln's) charge, on the 7th of November, 1861, on account of a bad fracture of the thigh; that he suffered severely many weeks, and has never completely recovered from the effects of the injury.

Dr. James T. Young, medical assistant, quartermaster's hospital, testifies (February 29, 1896) that George L. Benner was admitted to the quartermaster's hospital November 7, 1861, with a fracture of the thigh, and that he was discharged therefrom in March, 1862. He has never recovered from the effects of the injury. The fracture was treated by Dr. N. S. Lincoln with Dr. Young's assistance.

Your committee believe the bill is meritorious, and precedents having been set by previous action of Congress in pensioning the employees in Quartermaster's Department for injuries received in line of duty, earnestly recommend the passage of the bill without amendment.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will understand fully the proposition involved in this bill. There may have been cases in which a civilian employee of this Government during the late war, in an emergency, took a musket in his hands, went into the fight, and was wounded by some weapon of war, but if I understand the report just read, this man received no such honorable wound as that. From all that is disclosed here, this man may have been jammed against a tree by an obstreperous mule. And now it is proposed to put him upon a roll which should be a roll of honor. I trust that this House, with a due regard for men who bear upon their persons honorable wounds, will not go into the business of pensioning civil employees of this Government. I desire that the House shall understand the nature of this case.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is it understood that this bill proposes to pension a civil employee of the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. TERRY. This man seems to have been a teamster, and according to the report, as I caught the reading, he was shoved up against a tree, and thereby suffered injuries. On this account it is proposed to put him upon the pension roll, where properly only soldiers belong.

I have always said to my people in regard to pensions that my attitude was this: If our side—and in so speaking I mean the Southern side—had won, we would have pensioned all our soldiers who were disabled through honorable wounds or incurred disabilities in the line of duty; and that therefore no Southern man ought ever to object to that being done on the Union side. But I do protest that the roll of our American soldiery should not have put upon it a man who presents no better claim than is presented here. I will only add that if this bill be pressed I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon the proposition.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I called for the reading of this report because I saw from the bill that it proposed a new departure as to the pension list—that it proposed to place upon the list of pensioners a civil employee of the Government. I have nothing to say as to the arduous work of one who was engaged in the class of labor that this man performed during the war. But we have always drawn a distinction between the man who, having enlisted, took his life in his hands, his gun on his shoulder, and incurred the dangers of battle, and the man who preferred to go into the civil service of the Government and took employment there without incurring the dangers of military life. I believe that to depart from that distinction now is not wise, and for many reasons. In the first place, there was not in the civil service the same care taken in keeping up the list of persons rendering service, in looking after them, and ascertaining how any injuries received may have been incurred. In regard to these civil employees, we have in general no proper means of ascertaining whether a man who acted as a teamster or a laborer did anything more than simply take his pay, exercising at the end of the month his right to leave that employment if he chose.

I do not care to speak at length against this measure. It strikes me it is so obviously wrong that to mention the nature of the claim is sufficient to defeat it. I know how ready the people of the United States are to give the benefit of the doubt in favor of the soldier wherever injuries have been received. But we have a civil list embracing over 100,000 employees, including our postmasters and all others, and I think we ought not to enter either now or hereafter on the policy of pensioning civil employees.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman is probably not aware that we have already entered on that policy. We have in some cases pensioned telegraph operators. I do not think there is any justification whatever for such pensions. Civil employees of the Government receive higher pay than an ordinary soldier, yet they take no risk whatever. By entering upon a policy of this kind we endanger the pension roll.

Mr. McMILLIN. I agree fully with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]. If we have departed in any instance from the sound principle on this question, the more quickly we decline to extend the pension list in this way the better.

Mr. STEELE. I hope this bill will not receive favorable consideration from the soldiers of this House.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote the bill down.

Mr. ERDMAN. I move that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I rise to call up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7 and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and agree to the same.

N. M. CURTIS,
M. GRIFFIN,
D. G. TYLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

R. F. PETTIGREW,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, and 6 merely effect immaterial changes in the phraseology of the bill, and neither increase nor diminish the amount of the appropriations.

Senate amendment numbered 4 increases the appropriation specified in the House bill $5,000. Senate amendment numbered 7, from which it is recommended in the report that the Senate recede, proposed to increase the amount appropriated by the House bill $15,000. Amendments numbered 5 and 8 were designed to state the total appropriations for certain purposes to correspond with the increases proposed by amendments numbered 4 and 7.

Accordingly the bill will, in case the conference report be adopted, appropriate $5,000 more than the House bill and $15,000 less than the amount proposed by the Senate amendment.

The changes effected by the Senate amendments, to which it is recommended the House agree, are in detail as follows:

No. 1: On page 3, line 23, strike out "six" and insert "one sergeant and five."

No. 2: On page 4, line 1, strike out "six" and insert "two corporals and four;" so as to make the clause read as follows:

"For pay of the Military Academy Band: One sergeant and five enlisted musicians, at $34 per month, $2,448; two corporals and four enlisted musicians, at $20 per month, $1,440; twelve enlisted musicians, at $17 per month, $2,448; additional pay for length of service, $1,164; clothing on discharge, $240; retained pay on discharge, $60."

No. 3: On page 4, line 10, strike out "fourteen" and insert "one corporal and thirteen:" so as to make the clause read as follows:

"For pay of field musicians: One sergeant, $216; one corporal and thirteen privates, $2,184; additional pay for length of service, $84; clothing on discharge, $120; retained pay on discharge, $30."

No. 4: On page 16, after line 11, insert "for the purchase of one Maxim semiautomatic 3-pounder quick-firing gun mounted on field carriage complete, and ammunition therefor, $5,000."

No. 5: On page 16, line 15, strike out "sixty-eight" and insert "seventy-three;" so that the clause will read as follows:

"In all, for current and ordinary expenses, $73,502.50." This amendment merely changes the aggregate amount for the expenses mentioned to cover the increase of $5,000 for the Maxim gun.

No. 6: On page 19, lines 16, 17, and 18, reading as follows: "Total for Military Academy, $362,328.83" are stricken out.

The paragraph thus eliminated merely stated the aggregate of the appropriations made by the preceding provisions of the bill, and hence is of no practical consequence.

The foregoing are the amendments in detail to which it is recommended the House agree.

Amendments numbered 7 and 8, from which it is recommended the Senate recede, were respectively designed to effect the following changes, viz:

No. 7: To add $15,000 to the amount proposed to be appropriated by the House in lines, 18, 19, 20, and 21 on page 23: "For constructing a set of filter beds and connecting the same with the new reservoir and otherwise purifying the water, including all necessary appurtenances, to be immediately available," thus increasing the original amount named in the bill to $40,000, in lieu of $25,000, as adopted by the House.

This item will be retained at $25,000, if the report be adopted.

No. 8: On page 24, line 12, the Senate amendment proposed to strike out "eighty-two" and insert in lieu thereof "ninety-seven;" so that the paragraph would read: "In all, for public buildings and grounds, $97,244," in place of $82,244.

It is recommended in the report that the Senate recede from this amendment, and hence the amount remains as fixed by the House, viz, $82,244.

N. M. CURTIS,
M. GRIFFIN,
D. G. TYLER,
House Conferees.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As I understand, this conference report makes an increase of $5,000 over the amount of the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir; and a decrease of $15,000 upon the bill as amended by the Senate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The additional $5,000 is for the Maxim gun?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the next bill on the Calendar of unfinished business—Calendar number, 18—be passed over without prejudice, and that we proceed to the next bill.

There was no objection.

EMILY M. TYLER.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6560) to increase the pension of Emily M. Tyler.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment fixing the amount at $50, instead of $75.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the pending amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, strike out "75," and insert "50;" so as to read "at the rate of $50 per month."

Mr. TALBERT. I understand that that is the pending amendment, to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty."

The SPEAKER. That is the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, which is the pending motion.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is precisely the same in amount (as it will stand if amended) as the bill which we passed on yesterday, which was changed from $75 to $50 a month.

I do not care to discuss it, but trust the House will stand by its action of yesterday, and sustain the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

IRA H. SWEATT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill we just passed over on the Calendar of unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 1323) for the relief of Ira H. Sweatt, be now taken up for consideration. I asked that it be passed over a few moments ago under the impression that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] who is now absent desired to be heard upon it. I have been informed, however, that he does not care to be heard, and ask that it be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be now considered.

There was no objection.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the report be also read in connection with the bill.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1323) providing for the payment of a pension already granted to Ira H. Sweatt, of Company I, Thirteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, submit the following report:

Ira H. Sweatt enlisted January 1, 1864, and was discharged December 19, 1865. On September 10, 1870, he applied for a pension, alleging that while in front of Petersburg, Va., in July, 1864, he contracted dumb ague and malarial fever, and that as the result he had lost the use of both legs and his right arm, and that he could not walk with crutches. The pension was allowed, and he was granted a pension at the rate of $8 a month from the date of his discharge, in 1865, to May 10, 1871, and $20 a month from that date to June 3, 1872, and $24 a month thereafter.

On the 30th of June, 1882, he was dropped from the rolls on the ground that the disability for which pension was granted was not contracted in line of duty, but while absent without leave.

On July 25, 1890, Ira H. Sweatt made application for a pension under the act of June 27, 1890, alleging paralysis, which pension was allowed October 19, 1892, at $12 per month, from date of the application, with a proviso that all payments under that certificate should be withheld until the Government could be reimbursed for all payments made under the first certificate.

The evidence examined by your committee shows that Ira H. Sweatt twice appealed to the Secretary of the Interior against the order dropping him from the roll, but without success. The present disability of the claimant is beyond dispute, and is acknowledged by the Pension Bureau in granting him the largest amount of pension provided for under the act of 1890; but the trouble is that while the pension certificate says that he shall receive $12 per month, all payments will be withheld until in all probability this man will be in his grave.

The committee are satisfied that the claimant has no resources; is absolutely helpless; that all moneys heretofore received by him as a pension (and which he claims he was honestly entitled to) have been expended in his support. In view of the facts set forth, the complete paralysis of the claimant, his poverty, and present age, your committee believe that justice will be done by passing this bill that provides that the pension granted Ira H. Sweatt by certificate dated October, 1892, be continued, and they recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out all of the printed bill after the word "Volunteers," in line 5, and in place thereof inserting "a pension of $12 per month from the passage of this act, under certificate No. 121863, issued October 27, 1892, and no part of it shall be retained by any authority to reimburse the Government for any pension heretofore paid."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, General Bussey took action with reference to this bill, and what he thought of it and what he said I would like to have the House understand. I therefore ask to have read a communication from him on the subject, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1897.

Hon. JOSHUA W. MILES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request of the 18th instant, I have the honor to state that Ira Sweatt, late private Company I, Thirteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, pensioned by certificate No. 121863, is shown to have enlisted January 1, 1864, and served until September, 1864, when he was admitted to hospital at Point of Rocks, Md., for treatment for "fever," and was furloughed October 31, 1864. He never returned to his company, but was mustered out on an individual muster-out roll dated Boston, Mass., December 19, 1865, having been absent, sick, when regiment was mustered out.

He was pensioned in 1873 at $8 per month from December 20, 1865; $20 per month from May 10, 1871, and $24 per month from June 4, 1872.

His name was dropped from the roll December 3, 1882, on the ground that the disability for which he was pensioned, viz, paralysis of both legs and right arm, was not contracted in line of duty, but while absent without leave.

He made an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior in 1884, but the action of this Bureau was affirmed by the Secretary in the following language:

"Although the appellant has a hospital record of 'fever' in 1864, the evidence is not sufficient to show that he was permanently affected thereby. On the other hand, the weight of evidence tends to show that his present disability was incurred while in Canada, absent from his command without authority."

He entered a second appeal in September, 1890, and under date of October 2, 1890, Assistant Secretary Bussey affirmed the action of the Bureau in this language:

"From the appellant's own statements to the special examiner, it appears that soon after he arrived home on furlough he went to Canada, and never returned to his command nor to the Army, and was reported absent when his regiment was mustered out."

It is shown from the evidence procured by the special examiner in Canada that appellant, when he first came to that country, worked upon a farm, receiving the usual wages and performed the usual amount of labor required of men in that business.

That while in Canada he took a contract to put in water pipes, and worked at the same until his health failed, when he procured another to complete the contract; that some time in July, 1865, he was digging a grave, when he was overcome by the heat, and sat down upon the ground and took cold, and was immediately taken sick, and the next day called in a physician; that when he recovered from such sickness he was partially paralyzed. Some of his neighbors say he had a sunstroke while digging the grave referred to. "In my opinion, the evidence clearly shows that the appellant's present disability is not due to his army service, but was contracted while laying pipe and digging a grave in Canada, while he was absent without leave, and your action in refusing to restore him to the pension rolls is approved and adhered to, and the appeal is dismissed."

In the statement made by the claimant to the special examiner in September, 1891, he admitted that he went to Canada about a week after he returned to Colebrook, N. H., on his furlough, and remained there doing work for several persons until he was taken down sick with a fever; but he claimed that he had not been well a day from the time he left the Army; that the first he ever noticed any trouble with his limbs was early in the summer of 1865, while still in Canada.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that there is no disposition to press that bill after the report which has just been read.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman in charge of the bill has anything to say in its favor, I would like to hear some reason given why the House should pass it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to take up the time of the House on that bill, having already, on two separate occasions, at considerable length, gone into a discussion of the case with gentlemen who opposed the bill in the Committee of the Whole.

The report read was taken from the remarks of my friend from Maryland [Mr. MILES], who opposed the bill in the Committee of the Whole, and afterwards before the House at an evening session.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman deny that this report which has been read is a report from the Department?

Mr. KNOX. Not at all.

Mr. LOUD. Then it can not be a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. KNOX. Not at all. It was read by him in connection with his remarks, as a communication from the office.

Mr. LOUD. But it is the Secretary's report?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly. The suggestion I made was that it was read at the Friday night meeting in the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, and was placed before the House at that time.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, presents as meritorious a pension case as has ever been presented in this House, and if it is now passed, very scanty justice only will be done to the pensioner. He stands to-day on the rolls of the Pension Office for $12 per month, and this bill simply directs and authorizes the payment of the pension which the office itself, after a full investigation, in 1892 granted to him, in lieu of a pension of a larger amount which I think they have unjustly deprived him of. This pensioner in 1892 was granted a pension of $12 per month.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Was he not pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, under the general law, and in 1892?

Mr. KNOX. He was.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. And under that law in 1892?

Mr. KNOX. I am going on to state the fact that he had a pension under the act of 1890 and 1892. When he went with the certificate to receive the small pension, he was told to call around some time after he had paid back the three or four thousand dollars he had already received from the Government, some thirty or forty years, if he could secure that privilege from the abode of shades, and receive the pension the Government had granted to him. Why did they not pay him his $12 a month, as they had granted him the pension? It was upon the following ground: This man is totally disabled, paralyzed in both legs. He could not cross this Hall in five minutes. One arm is entirely paralyzed. He has not the full use of the other arm. He has not a dollar in the world. He enlisted and served for almost one year. He then was taken sick, and these facts are not denied by anybody. He was taken sick with fever and dumb ague before Petersburg. He went to the hospital. The testimony is full and uncontradicted as to what his disease was, that it was malaria and dumb ague.

After he had recovered sufficiently to travel he went to his home by permission. He went to Colebrook, N. H. Where is Colebrook? That, Mr. Speaker, is the source of the charge that he went to Canada, which is sought to be used to do an injustice to this man. Colebrook is on the line between New Hampshire and Canada. When he went to the Army, he left his wife with his brother-in-law, who resided just this side of the line in New Hampshire. His brother-in-law, before he returned, had taken a farm in Canada, just across the line. The town of Eaton, which adjoins Colebrook, is just across the line in Canada, and all this talk about his going to Canada and doing some work there is based upon that. It is the same as a man living in Washington doing some work in Alexandria.

His testimony, which is corroborated by the physicians, is that he never recovered sufficiently to return to the Army, and that is what is meant by his being absent without leave. He says that he never recovered from that disease, and the testimony is full on that point, that he was not able to go back. As far as it was known in the Army at the time, he was absent without leave; but I submit to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that subsequent to this, when the facts were investigated, this man was honorably discharged, and he stands with a perfectly clear record. He was not put down as a deserter, but when it was seen that he had not recovered, and was not able to return to the Army, he received an honorable discharge. While at home he was taken sick in the summer with paralysis of both legs and paralysis of his arm.

Now, he claimed that that paralysis resulted from the fever and dumb ague contracted at Petersburg, and I will say to the gentleman that every physician who examined him so testified. The pension examiners, every one of them, and other physicians without exception, testify that this man is a hopeless wreck, solely on account of the disease contracted in the Army while before Petersburg, and I wish to say further that, on a subsequent investigation, every physician who has examined this man, from that time until now, has said that he is a helpless wreck, solely on account of the disease that he contracted in the trenches before Petersburg. What did the Government do with him? He applied for a pension in 1872. He was granted one in 1873, allowing him $8 per month, and then running up to $24 per month, the amount allowed to a man totally disabled. He drew that pension for about ten years, until 1882. Then somebody wrote a letter to the Pension Office, saying that somebody else told him that Ira H. Sweatt did not contract his disease in the Army, but contracted it while he was in Canada, without leave. Now, I have explained what the "without leave" means, and I have explained what being in Canada means.

Thereupon the Pension Office sent a detective, as I call him, or somebody, to look up the facts. Now, the testimony was very conflicting. Look over this report. It contains the statement that this man contracted his disease while laying a pipe, while digging a grave, while digging a well, and while out in the hay field. Now, which was he doing? Was he digging a grave or was he trying to pipe somebody to the other world? All four of the grounds which I have mentioned are testified to by these witnesses.

Mr. ERDMAN. How do you get over the admission to the pension examiner?

Mr. KNOX. Will you kindly indicate to me what admission you mean?

Mr. ERDMAN. As set forth in the report just read, he admitted that he contracted these disabilities in the way there stated.

Mr. KNOX. I get over it in precisely this way: That the man never admitted any such thing, and the evidence in the Pension Office is not to that effect. The admission was that he never was paralyzed until he had returned to his home, and that we fully admit; but it is a contemptible misapplication of testimony to say that this man, after he had sworn that he was paralyzed, after he had sworn that he was a well man when he went into the Army, then admitted that he never had had any disease previous to being in Canada.

Mr. ERDMAN. Do you challenge the accuracy of the report from the Bureau as read?

Mr. KNOX. I challenge the inference. I make no charges against anybody, but I challenge the inference that is drawn from it. I say it is unfair, when a private detective goes to this man and asks him if he had paralysis previous to being in Canada, to have him report that the man contracted his disability somewhere else than in the Army.

Mr. ERDMAN. It is not an inference; it is an admission that I would like to have explained.

Mr. KNOX. Of what? He had never admitted except to the extent that I say—that he never had paralysis except in Canada.

Mr. ERDMAN. The report of the Pension Bureau says that he admitted that he had contracted the disability in the manner specified.

Mr. KNOX. What disability?

Mr. ERDMAN. The fever and ague.

Mr. KNOX. No, no—paralysis; and every particle of medical testimony was that the paralysis resulted, and naturally resulted, from the disease which he contracted before Petersburg. Now, when this man found that his pension was taken away from him, he took other evidence. He had the evidence of every physician of Lowell, where he resided, who examined him; and every man who knew him testified that he was a well man when he went into the Army.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. This is a soldier who has an honorable discharge?

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. And he is drawing a pension of $12 a month?

Mr. KNOX. That is the rate at which he is on the roll.

Mr. SPALDING. That is the rate at which he is on the roll. He has a certificate; and the only question is whether the Government will allow him to draw that until he has repaid what he drew at a higher rate, and it would run that way until after he died, and that is where the pinch comes.

Mr. KNOX. I am only asking that he be allowed to draw the amount for which he is on the roll.

Mr. SPALDING. There is no question as to whether he went to Canada or not, nor as to his drawing a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. STEELE. However, it may be stated that he received his honorable discharge long since the war, under a provision of law allowing him to make certain proof.

Mr. MILNES. He was discharged in 1865.

Mr. STEELE. His discharge was dated 1865, but procured along in 1880.

Mr. KNOX. No, no; the discharge——

Mr. STEELE. His discharge was given him in 1880, after the law had passed——

Mr. KNOX. Oh, no.

Mr. STEELE. To enable him to get a discharge.

Mr. SPALDING. You are mistaken.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think so.

Mr. KNOX. It is not true. The Pension Office decided that the man was not entitled to the large rate of pension which he had. He failed to get it restored at that amount, and he has lost that pension. I am not here claiming it, although I could make a very strong case before this House or before the Committee on Invalid Pensions in favor of restoring him to that rate. But I give it up. I let it go. I simply ask that this man may be paid at the rate at which he is borne on the roll, so that he may receive it during the few more years he has to live. He is left a helpless cripple. The Pension Office says he can not be paid until he shall have repaid the money which he thus received. Now, that practice of making a soldier repay money which has been received upon a pension erroneously granted is very doubtful in its legal authority. The furthest extent that it has been carried by the decisions of the Department of the Interior is this: That where a pension has been granted through fraud of the pensioner or through a mistake of fact by the Pension Office, then that the amount formerly taken may be set off against the pension which he receives.

Now, no fraud has been found in this case. Fraud is never presumed against anybody. There is no finding of fraud in the Pension Office against this man. What is the mistake of fact? Not a mistake of collateral fact; not a mistake in one of a number of facts that come before the findings of the Pension Office, but a mistake in some material fact upon which the pension rests—for instance, pensioning a man as major when his real rank turns out to have been only that of captain; pensioning a woman for a minor child when it appears on looking again at the fact that the child was of age. It is only these grounds on which the pension can be set off.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I conclude these remarks by saying that there is not a particle of evidence in this case that this man is obnoxious to either of these two grounds; and I am willing to rest this case upon the simple proposition and submit it to every lawyer in the House that with no finding of fraud on the part of this man, with no mistake of material fact, it is not only unjust, but it is illegal, to deprive him of the pension the Government has already granted him. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer one or two suggestions in regard to this case. This pensioner's case has been twice adjudicated by Republican administrations.

Mr. KNOX. Not the facts of the case, but that he should not receive a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. LOUD (continuing). Once, in 1884, permit me to say, the pensioner was stricken from the rolls of the Pension Office. Again he made application, after 1890, under, I believe, one of the most liberal pension administrations that this country ever had. He was placed on the roll—at what rate? At the rate of $12 per month, under the act of 1890. Now, then, under that Republican administration, they emphatically stated, so far as they could, that this pensioner's disability was not the result of his service. What we have, so far as the evidence is concerned, from the Executive Departments is conclusive. I would take the testimony of the Pension Department, at least when it is under a Republican Executive, as readily as I would take the ex parte statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, I do not object to placing this man upon the pension roll, but I do object to singling out individuals and making exceptions. The House has established an unwritten code of its own, and I wish to quote here certain language which was used on the floor yesterday to show what position the House assumes in pension cases. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROWTHER] said, speaking of the Hough case:

> The original bill having failed to become a law at the figure that has been agreed upon as the amount that should be allowed to the widows of general officers of the Army, $50 per month, this bill proposes to give the beneficiary that amount.

Now, I think it would be much more becoming this House, instead of having an unwritten law or an agreement applicable to special classes of cases and accepted by unanimous or by almost unanimous consent, if members would have the manhood of their convictions and would say by law that the widows of general officers shall receive $50 a month without discrimination. Why not enact into law what you say day after day is the policy that you follow in your pension committees?

Mr. Speaker, as regards this case, I venture to say there are five or ten thousand individuals in the country who have obtained pensions by fraud, and the amounts paid them under such conditions are being deducted from them now. If that is right in those cases, it is right in all, and should be carried out uniformly. If it is wrong, if by general consent of this House you propose to revise your pension laws, then, I repeat, have the manhood of your convictions and say that any pensioner, having obtained a pension or an increase of pension by fraud and having been restored to the rolls, shall not suffer a deduction. Do that, instead of forcing men to come here and appeal for special bills. If it is right to withhold pension money obtained by fraud from one, it is right to withhold it from everyone else. These are my objections to this bill. I do not approve and I never can approve of this system of special legislation by which a great representative body like this has an unwritten law or rule for those who appeal to it through its pension committees, giving them higher rates of pension than they would receive under the general law. If you desire to give to the widows of officers $50 a month, enact that into statute, and do not attempt to do it by an unwritten law. If you do not desire to deduct money obtained by pensioners by fraud, then enact that policy into law and make it applicable to everybody.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was adopted.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, there were—ayes 83, noes 35.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, only 21 members voting therefor.

The bill was read a third time.

The question being on the passage,

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Clerk has not the engrossed copy in his possession. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ISAAC HOLBROOK.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2396) granting a pension to Isaac Holbrook.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET KIRKPATRICK.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6099) granting a pension to Margaret Kirkpatrick.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will not insist on having this bill passed without a word of debate. It appears to be a bill to pension a nurse.

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman desires, I am perfectly willing that the report shall be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

> The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6099) granting a pension to Margaret Kirkpatrick, beg leave to submit the following report:
>
> The Pension Office records show that Margaret Vincent served and was paid as matron of the post hospital at Macon, Mo., from November 1, 1864, to April 6, 1865, five months and six days; and that service was of a character and under authority recognized by the War Department and recognized by the Pension Office as pensionable under the act of August 5, 1892, provided it were six months in duration. The service of which there is record commenced November 1, 1864, and lacks twenty-four days of the six months prescribed, but the evidence shows that her service as nurse really commenced in the summer of 1864 and was of sufficient length to bring her within the law if her earlier service had been rendered under authority recognized by the War Department.
> An affidavit of Surg. A. B. Castle, of the post hospital at Macon, Mo., on file in the Pension Office, shows that Margaret Vincent was employed as nurse and matron in that hospital from some time in the summer of 1864 until the spring of 1865, but he can not give the precise dates. While this perhaps does not meet the technical requirements of the law, it does show that the claimant actually rendered more than six months' service as nurse and matron in a United States post hospital.
>
> The evidence shows that the claimant is over 62 years of age, is unable to earn a support by reason of age and physical infirmity, and has no means or income from any source.
>
> The passage of the bill is recommended.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The documents referred to embrace the reports of the president and secretary of the Commission, and a report of the executive committee on awards, with exhibits relating to the same. They are contained in five boxes of considerable size, which, instead of actually transmitting with this communication, I have deposited in the State Department subject to the action and direction of the Congress.

JOHN NICHOLS.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 638) granting an increase of pension to John Nichols.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMAS. I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the gentleman any objection to the reading of the report?

Mr. THOMAS. Pending the call for the previous question, I ask that the report be read.

The report (as already published) was read.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to ask the gentleman, in regard to this bill, why it is that this soldier could not have applied to the Pension Bureau in the regular way and obtained a pension? His disabilities seem to have been ratable, and there would have been no difficulty in his making application in the regular way and obtaining possibly a higher rate of pension than this bill proposes to allow. According to the statement of the report, the man is wholly incapacitated for manual labor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, all I know of this case is embodied in the report of the committee. It seems that this soldier did apply at the Pension Department, and was refused a pension. He was shot through the shoulder, and his arm was perfectly disabled, although he did not lose the arm. Had he lost it entirely, he would receive the pension of $36 a month; and the report, in consequence of his condition, finds that he is entitled to the same amount that he would have been entitled to had it been a total loss of the arm.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill was read three times, and passed.

GEORGE B. CUSTER.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar of was the bill (S. 1806) granting a pension to George B. Custer, late sergeant Company H, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

Mr. THOMAS. I move the previous question on the adoption of the amendments and passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to hear the report read in this case.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the report is quite a lengthy one, and perhaps I can make a statement that will obviate the reading.

This man was a soldier in the Mexican war, as well as in the late war. The bill does not carry much, considering the disabled condition of the man and the services he rendered. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the reading of the report.

Mr. TALBERT. I make no objection, on the statement of the gentleman.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was read three times, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended to conform to the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

HENRY MACKRILL.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3690) restoring a pension to Henry Mackvill, alias Henry Mackey, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

Mr. THOMAS. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the report in that case be read.

Mr. THOMAS. I will withdraw the demand until the report is read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the House will give its attention to the reading of the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3690) granting a pension to Henry Mackrill, alias Henry Mackey, late landsman in the United States Navy, having carefully considered all the facts and circumstances presented, respectfully report as follows:

The Auditor for the Navy Department says:

"Henry Mackrill, landsman, enlisted at the naval station at Chicago, and was entered on the rolls of the Princeton January 23, 1864, and served to March 3, 1864; on the Ticonderoga to May 4, 1865, as landsman; on the Princeton as ordinary seaman to May 11, 1865, and was discharged from the Sabine as ordinary seaman August 3, 1865. The rolls do not show anything in reference to his being a Confederate prisoner or having served in the Confederate army."

The War Department records show:

"Henry Mackrill, private, Company D, Ninth Mississippi Infantry, C. S. A., enlisted April 11, 1862, at Vicksburg, Miss., for three years, and is reported on rolls to August 31, 1863, 'present.' October 31, 1863, 'absent, sick since October 20, 1863, by order Surgeon Williams.' December 31, 1863, 'absent, missing in action since day after Missionary Ridge, November 25, 1863. Reported as deserter.' Name not found on rolls of later date. Nature of disability not stated. Prisoner of war records show Henry Mackeral, Company D, Ninth Mississippi Infantry, captured at Chickamauga, Tenn., November 26, 1863. Confined at Rock Island, Ill., December 13, 1863, where he enlisted in the United States Navy, and sent to naval rendezvous, Camp Douglas, Ill., January 25, 1864."

Claimant alleges that at breaking out of the war he was a British subject and engaged in cutting wood on the Lower Mississippi; that the floods washed his wood away, and it was impracticable to get any work or even anything to eat unless he enlisted, and under the pressure of his surroundings he enlisted in the Confederate States army, intending to get away at first opportunity, which came at battle of Mission Ridge, when he and eight others surrendered to one Union soldier.

When he enlisted in the United States Navy he asked to have his name put on rolls as "Henry Mackey," for fear that he might be taken prisoner; but this was not done. After the war he was known as Henry Mackey; had the legislature of Indiana change his name to Henry Mackey; became a naturalized citizen under that name, and has been known as Henry Mackey ever since.

He applied for pension under act of June 27, 1890 (filed July 4, 1890), and again May 9, 1891, and with the latter an affidavit stating his prior Confederate service. His pension was allowed October 2, 1891, at $12 per month from July 25, 1890, for "catarrh, disease of rectum, kidneys, and eyes."

He was dropped from the rolls for "disloyalty" September 23, 1895, under authority of section 4716, Revised Statutes, having voluntarily aided or abetted the rebellion against the authority of the United States.

There is no question in this case but that the applicant is disabled for performing manual labor. The board of examining surgeons at Delhi, Ind., July 15, 1891, rated him four-eighteenths for nervous debility, six-eighteenths for post-nasal catarrh, two-eighteenths for disease of eyes, four-eighteenths for kidneys, and four-eighteenths for piles, and his disabilities have progressed since then.

The construction of the act of June 27, 1890, which prevailed several months without objection, while the Congress which enacted it was still in session, that ninety days' service and an honorable discharge, without regard to previous loyalty, were the prerequisites to a pensionable status under that act, gave this sailor a pension, to which your committee believe he was justly entitled, he having faithfully served more than one and one-half years and being honorably discharged.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Strike out the words "or reinstate" in line 4; substitute the name "Mackrill" for "Mackvill" in line 5; strike out the word "fifteen" in line 7 and insert "twelve" in lieu thereof, and strike out all after the word "month" in line 8.

Also, amend the title of bill so as to read: "Granting a pension to Henry Mackrill, alias Henry Mackey."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I want the House to understand that this is a bill to pension a gentleman of divers, sundry, and innumerable aliases——

Mr. LOUD. And services.

Mr. DOCKERY. And services, as suggested by my friend from California; a soldier of fortune, a British subject, who voluntarily served, as shown by the report, on both sides during the late struggle, having served more than a year and a half in the Confederate army and then deserted. I simply want to challenge the attention of our friends on the other side to the conditions presented by this case, to know whether or not it is their purpose to enter upon this line of pensions.

This gentleman was a British subject who served, as I have stated, in the Confederate army, having voluntarily entered it, and basely betrayed the cause, according to the report, and then for a brief time served in the Army of the Union. He now comes to Congress and asks a pension of $12 per month.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the case is wholly without merit, and the House ought not to pass it.

I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. DOCKERY. The motion is not debatable; but I will withdraw it temporarily.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to state for the information of the House that this man came from England just before the beginning of the war, and was at work on the Lower Mississippi cutting wood when the war broke out. It soon became a question whether he should enlist in the Confederate army or starve. He had to enlist, and served a little over a year. At the first opportunity he deserted to the Union Army, and served a year and a half on a Union gunboat. Afterwards he became naturalized and made application for a pension under the act of 1890, which was granted.

Under the construction put on the law by a Republican administration, he received a pension and drew that for five years. At the time he made the application for pension he also made an affidavit that he had been in the Confederate army, which affidavit is on record. He is identified in the Department; he has a record; he served a year and a half as a gallant Union soldier, and he is disabled to the extent specified in the report. I know the man well; he is a good citizen; I know his condition, and that he is disabled as shown in the report. He drew a pension, as I say, under a Republican administration of the office, but was deprived of it a little over a year ago by the present Democratic administration.

I am not standing here, sir, for the purpose of asking a pension for a Confederate soldier, but a pension for a Union soldier, a man who served a year and a half in the Army, and is entitled to a pension as much as any other man who ever served in it and was disabled to the extent that he is disabled.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the committee, I desire to say that under previous administrations prior service in the Confederate army did not bar applicants for pensions, if those applicants had a status under the law of subsequent service of ninety days and an honorable discharge from the Union Army. Upon that basis the committee passed upon this bill and restored this pension of $12 a month.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman if he assumes that the proper interpretation of the present law would give this applicant a pension?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Well, then, if the Executive Departments are failing to properly administer the law, would it not be well for us to remind them of it in some way, so that they can apply it to everybody alike?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; but the condition is this: It has been decided in both ways by the Department, and under this administration this pension was taken from this man who was already drawing it. The House has already passed on this question, on what is known as the Pickler bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long did this fellow serve in the Confederacy?

Mr. DOCKERY. A year and a half.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee looked over the facts, and based their report upon them. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. LOUD. It does not seem to me——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] asks for the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] be heard.

Mr. LOUD. Of course, if this House intends to pension every person who served in the Union Army, regardless of service in the Confederate army, why let him go to the Pension Office and get his pension; but if we have a law which is interpreted in such a manner that this man is not entitled to a pension, I do not think this Congress ought to review it.

As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] aptly stated, this man is a soldier of fortune, or a citizen of fortune, or a fellow of fortune, whatever you may term him. He is what we used to term in the Army—and you who were there know well what it means—a floater, liable to turn up anywhere where it was safe to be. I suppose very likely that was the gentleman's record in the Confederate army. He says that eight of them surrendered to one Union soldier. He says further that he enlisted with the firm determination to get away as soon as he could. Yet it took him a year and seven or eight months to get away from the Confederate army. Then he went into the Navy—on the rivers, I suppose. None of his record is given here. Some gentleman says he has a very gallant and meritorious record in the Navy. I never have known a committee yet, when they could dig up, from any possible recess, any gallantry or meritorious service that a man, even in his wildest moments, might have imagined that he rendered to his country, or any other, to fail to set forth the service in their report. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, when an applicant comes to this body to receive its beneficence his case appears in at least the best possible form in which he can draw it up.

This applicant was a Confederate soldier. Probably he served in the Confederacy until he got tired. I am willing to admit that. He enlisted in the Navy, went onto a ship, and probably could not get away. That was a good, safe place for a man who desired to desert. If this soldier is entitled to any pension, he ought to receive a double pension. You ought to do equity and pension him for his service in the Confederacy and then pension him for his service in the Union Army, because he really is entitled to two pensions under the two services he has rendered to different portions of the United States.

Then this gentleman, as well as having several services, has several names. His name is Macrill and Mackeral, which is the name of a fish——

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, if he is willing to accept a pension under the name of "Mackeral," I have no objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. And again, his name appears as Mackey. He has three names and two services, but nothing that I believe should entitle him to the consideration of this body. I should like to know why he should receive any pension. I should like to have any gentleman show to this House why a man who voluntarily entered the Confederate service and served a year and six or seven months should be entitled to a special act of the greatest legislative body, as we often term it, on the face of the earth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table; and on a division (demanded by Mr. THOMAS) there were—ayes 48, noes 31.

Accordingly the bill was laid on the table.

PETER J. CLAASSEN.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2221) granting an increase of pension to Peter J. Claassen.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY FORWARD.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4930) granting a pension to Mary Forward.

The bill was read.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were read.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report in this case, Mr. Speaker.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4930) granting a pension to Mary Forward, respectfully report:

This claimant was married December 24, 1855, to Charles Branch, who served in Company I, Tenth Veteran Reserve Corps, and who died March 24, 1865. She was pensioned as his widow until October 7, 1866, when she was again married, this time to Joseph Forward, who died December 22, 1891. The claimant is now old, disabled, and needy. She was the wife of the soldier during the war, and cared for their three children during his absence in the service.

In view of these facts your committee are of opinion that this woman should not be left to suffer in her age and decrepitude. In consequence of her remarriage the Government was relieved from the payment of about $2,500, the amount she would have received as pension from date of her remarriage to the present time had she not remarried.

Your committee are of opinion that she should be again pensioned, and recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out the words "of Allegan, Mich.," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "formerly the."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, here is a case presenting a claim for pension to which the beneficiary is clearly not entitled under the law. She asked for a pension under the act of June 27, 1890, and she was not married to this soldier until in July, 1891. The law especially says that the widow must have been married to the soldier prior to the passage of the act of June 27, 1890, before she is entitled. So that she is clearly not entitled to a pension under a strict construction of the law. Again, she has remarried. She is a remarried widow; and the law expressly says that a widow who remarries voluntarily relinquishes all her right, title, and claim to pension. I submit that we should not, in direct violation of the plain letter of the law, grant this claim. I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the lady whom this bill proposes to pension is the war widow of a soldier. It is true that she afterwards married, and it is also true that the Government from that marriage has been saved something over $2,000. I know this woman personally. She is aged and dependent, and as she was the war widow, remaining at home and taking care of a large family of children while her husband was in the war, I think it is nothing but just that this bill should pass. That is all I desire to say, and I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. LOUD. One of these statements is incorrect. There is a great discrepancy between the statement of the gentleman from Michigan and that of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. She was the widow of a soldier, and received a pension up to the time of her remarriage.

Mr. THOMAS. Up to the time of her remarriage, after the death of her first husband, she did receive a pension.

Mr. TALBERT. But when she remarried she relinquished her right to a pension under the law; and, then, she was not married to this soldier until July, 1891, and the law expressly states that the marriage must have taken place prior to the passage of the act of 1890. It is alleged also by the gentleman that this lady is poor, needy, and deserving. That is no doubt true. But is that any reason why this House should grant the claim of a woman for a pension? There are hundreds and thousands of others who are poor and needy, just as much so as this woman.

Mr. LOUD. There seems to be a great discrepancy between the statements of the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Michigan. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina to say that this woman did not marry this soldier until after 1890, and then the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. THOMAS. The second marriage——

Mr. LOUD (continuing). Says that the second marriage was in July, 1891.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no. Her second marriage was prior to that, many years—in 1866.

Mr. TALBERT. I understand she remarried——

Mr. THOMAS. She married the soldier in 1855.

Mr. TALBERT. I am not speaking of that marriage. I am speaking of the second marriage. I understand she has been drawing a pension as the widow of her first husband up to the time of her remarriage. Then she claims pension——

Mr. THOMAS. The second husband died in 1891.

Mr. TALBERT. Then she remarried a year after the passage of the act in 1890. I think it is so stated in the report.

Mr. LOUD. These are very material statements. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan the statement as I understand it. This widow did not marry the soldier on account of whose service she claims a pension until after 1890. That is the statement.

Mr. THOMAS. That is not true.

Mr. LOUD. These statements should be corrected.

Mr. TALBERT. The report shows that. I will ask that the report be again read.

Mr. THOMAS. The report is short; let it be read again to the House.

The report was again read.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. THOMAS said: I think that is all that is necessary.

Mr. TALBERT. I was mistaken. I took the date 1891 to be the date of her remarriage. Anyhow, she is a remarried widow. It is a little better case than I thought it was, but still I do not think it is a meritorious case.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the gentleman for his first statement. I demand the previous question on the bill to its passage, Mr. Speaker.

The previous question was ordered: and under the operation thereof the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TALBERT. I demand the reading of the engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the engrossed copy, and that not being present, the bill will go over.

ELIZABETH A. MARTHON.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5764) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Marthon.

The bill was read.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. HALTERMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5764) entitled "A bill granting a pension to Elizabeth D. Marthon," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommended that said bill do pass with amendments:

The claimant is the widow of Joseph Marthon, late a lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, whose service began as a seaman September 30, 1861. He was subsequently promoted through the several grades to the rank of acting master, which he held when honorably discharged December 31, 1865. He was reappointed acting master April 19, 1866, and was subsequently promoted for valuable and meritorious service, until he finally attained the rank of lieutenant-commander July 1, 1882. His death occurred while still on the active list, and from causes originating in the service, at Shanghai, China, November 19, 1891, and his widow is now receiving the pension of $30 per month allowed by the general laws to the widows of lieutenant-commanders who die from causes of service origin.

The following statement of Hon. S. L. MILLIKEN, member of Congress, shows the facts upon which your committee bases its favorable recommendation:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1896.

Mrs. Marthon is a native of Belfast, Me., the city in which I reside. I have known her since she was a girl, and knew her family, which was one of the prominent old families of Belfast. I knew her husband, Lieut. Commander Joseph Marthon, when he was alive. Since his death the little property which he left has suffered such losses that she is dependent almost entirely upon her pension for the support of herself and her husband's mother and maiden sister, also.

S. L. MILLIKEN, Member of Congress.

The following amendments to the bill are recommended:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth D. Marthon;" and strike out the initial "A." where it appears in claimant's name in the body of the bill and substitute therefor the initial "D.;" also strike out the word "seventy-five," in line 6, and substitute therefor the word "fifty," so as to fix the rating at $50 per month.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question upon the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

HANS JOHNSON.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1495) granting a pension to Hans Johnson.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1495) granting a pension to Hans Johnson, adopt as their own the annexed Senate report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 173, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1495) granting a pension to Hans Johnson, have had the same under consideration and report:

Hans Johnson, late corporal of Company I, Twenty-seventh Regiment Iowa Infantry, enlisted August 15, 1862, and was honorably discharged by reason of surgeon's certificate of disability June 14, 1865, at Montgomery, Ala. The claimant has drawn a pension, in sums varying from $5.33½ a month to $8, from the date of his discharge to July 28, 1890, when his application under the dependent pension law of June 27, 1890, was approved by the Pension Bureau at $12 a month for disease of the eyes and gunshot wound of the right thigh.

The testimony in the claim, too voluminous for detailed presentation, is clear and ample as to the following facts: That Johnson was a sound man when he entered the service, and continued so until attacked by dysentery, and the incurrence of the gunshot wound in his thigh, and the disease of the eyes which developed while in the service.

These facts are substantiated by the affidavits of the captain of his company, who enlisted him, and of the comrades who served with him, as well as by the surgeon's certificate of disability on which he was discharged. Since the war the continuance and increase of his disabilities are testified to by twelve physicians of the best repute, residing in the claimant's city and county, and covering all the years between 1868 to 1890, such physicians having either attended him professionally or certified to his condition as members of pension examination boards. His disabilities since the war and their progressive character are also testified to by the claimant's neighbors and associates, among whom is the name of ex-Governor Lucius F. Hubbard. The Hon. C. K. DAVIS, Senator, has also stated to the committee his personal tribute to the high character of the claimant, and of the progress of his disabilities within his observation. The sum of all this testimony is that the disease of the eyes now amounts practically to total blindness; or, in the language of N. Juell, M. D., of the claimant's city, Red Wing, Minn.:

"N. Juell, being duly sworn, on oath says that he is a duly licensed and practicing physician in the said State and residing at the city of Red Wing, in said State; that he has examined the eyes of Hans Johnson (late of Company I, Twenty-seventh Iowa Regiment Volunteers), and that he finds a central atrophic coroido-retinitis involving both eyes; the central field of vision is entirely obliterated, so that he can not see the sun. In the marginal field he can see objects when placed in a strong light, but not sufficiently clear to count his fingers; as a consequence he is almost totally blind, and has to guide himself with a stick when walking. The disease is gradually progressing."

This affidavit is dated January 7, 1896, and represents the claimant's present condition. It is a condition of utter helplessness, and entitles the claimant to a substantial increase beyond that which he is now receiving.

Your committee therefore approve the bill and recommend its passage, after being amended by striking out the word "seventy-two," in line 8, and substituting therefor the word "fifty."

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT KIRACOFE.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1017) granting a pension to Robert Kiracofe.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN DAY.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6803) granting a pension to Ellen Day, stepmother of Albert L. Day.

The bill was read.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the report in that case read.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6803) granting a pension to Ellen Day, stepmother of Albert L. Day, having carefully considered the same, report as follows:

The soldier, Albert L. Day, enlisted and was duly enrolled as a private of Company I, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, April 20, 1861, and was killed in battle at Cedar Mountain August 9, 1862. He was never married.

The claimant, Ellen Day, was duly married to Berry Day, the father of said soldier, on the 17th day of August, 1847, at which time the said soldier was but 18 months old. From this time until the day of his enlistment she always treated him with the utmost kindness, the same as if he was her own son, and he always exhibited the greatest fondness and affection for her.

Said Berry Day, the father of said soldier, filed an application for pension as the dependent father June 17, 1885, but his claim was rejected March 1, 1886, on the ground of nondependence. Subsequently, by special act of Congress approved June 4, 1888, he was granted a pension of $8 per month, which he continued to draw until his death, which occurred April 19, 1889.

The claimant never remarried. She is now aged and without any property whatever. She is in feeble health and has no income except what she is able to make by sewing for others. The foregoing facts are fully shown by the official records and the sworn testimony of persons having personal knowledge of the facts.

Your committee is therefore of the opinion that this stepmother should, in the spirit of the pension laws granting pensions to mothers of soldiers, be regarded and treated as the mother of said soldier, Albert L. Day, and does therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment:

Insert after the name "Ellen Day," in the fifth line thereof, the word "dependent."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is another violation of the law. There is no law for pensioning stepmothers.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from South Carolina, I will say that this is not the first instance of the House granting a pension to a foster mother or a stepmother. In the present session of this Congress the Senate has passed a bill for the relief of Mary T. Young——

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, the Senate will do anything.

Mr. BROMWELL. But this was a House bill which was passed here at the last session, granting a pension of $12 a month to a dependent foster mother. Now, the facts in this case, as shown by the report, are these: The mother of this boy married the father when the child was only 18 months old. She had the care of him all through his infancy and until he grew to be a lad of 15 years of age, when he went into the Army. Within a year after entering the service he was killed. The husband had no other children. He himself afterwards, by the action of Congress, drew a pension of $8 a month. He left his widow without any support whatever and without any other children, either of her own or of his, to whom to look for aid. This boy was, to all intents and purposes, the same as her own child.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the report shows that the father was not dependent upon the son, and that it took a special act of Congress to get him on the pension roll.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is true. By the action of Congress he was granted a pension of $8 a month. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is in the line of several precedents that have been set by Congress, the case is a just and proper one, and I ask for the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Certainly.

Mr. ERDMAN. Does not the gentleman think that every other stepmother similarly situated ought to be pensioned?

Mr. BROMWELL. I most certainly do.

Mr. ERDMAN. And does not the gentleman think that pensioning one and leaving the others unpensioned is an injustice to them?

Mr. BROMWELL. I should be in favor of granting a pension in every similar case, where it is shown that the woman is old and dependent, and that she took care of the child, clothed him, tended him in his infancy and in his tender years as a mother would have done. In all such cases, I say, the dependent foster mother has the same claim upon the beneficence of this Government as if she had been the actual mother of the deceased soldier.

Mr. ERDMAN. But does not the gentleman think that picking out a case here and there to the exclusion of others is an injustice to the others?

Mr. BROMWELL. It is not if the others as they come are treated in the same way.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the engrossed copy is not at the desk, and the Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

MAJ. GEN. JULIUS H. STAHEL.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1694) to increase the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahel.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its passage, but pending that, I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE].

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the words "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty;" so as to make the pension $50 per month.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. The Chair understands that the previous question is moved, subject to this amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

The amendment was read.

Mr. BLUE. I wish merely to say that this House within the last few days has fixed the pension of Mrs. General Carr at $50 a month; of Mrs. General Hough at $50; of Mrs. General Tyler at $50; and also, as the gentleman from Oregon suggests, the pension of Mrs. Morrow at the same rate. I hope the House will adhere to the rule which it has thus established, and not increase this pension beyond $50.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered on the bill to its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE].

Mr. THOMAS. This is a pension to the general himself—not a pension to his widow. The cases mentioned by the gentleman from Kansas are cases of widows' pensions. General Stahel is now receiving a pension of $50 a month.

Mr. BLUE. And he has been in the public service a long time.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 46, noes 8.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed; there being on a division (called for by Mr. TALBERT)—ayes 45, noes 1.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, House bill No. 4534, identical in its provisions with the bill just passed, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

BETSEY J. WEBBER.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 178) granting a pension to Betsey J. Webber.

The bill, with the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, was read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD WILCOXTON.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4901) to pension Richard Wilcoxton for services in the late war.

The bill and the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House were read.

Mr. THOMAS. I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to hear the report read in this case.

The SPEAKER. The report may be read by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the report (as already published) was read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I believe debate on this question is cut off by the previous question, unless I am entitled to fifteen minutes under the rule. I do not want to occupy that much time. I believe, however, this bill may have been debated in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is understood to have been debated in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman in charge of the bill may explain to the House upon what grounds it is necessary to have a special act passed to pension this soldier, as it has been found that his disabilities are sufficient to entitle him to a pension under the existing general law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to discuss this question myself——

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KERR] made the report in this case; and I suppose he is familiar with the facts. I am not.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand exactly the foundation of the objection of the gentleman from Ohio to this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The report shows that this soldier had made an application under the old law; and while it was pending he made application under the new law. No disability was discovered which under this law entitled him to relief. It appears that then, upon an examination under the old law, disabilities were disclosed sufficient to entitle him to a pension of $12 a month. Now, I ask why is it necessary that a special act should be passed for his relief?

Mr. KERR. Let me explain to the gentleman the ground on which the Committee on Invalid Pensions founded their decision. This soldier had applied to the Pension Office for pension under the law of 1890, and had been rejected upon the ground that some medical board had decided that he had no disability. He then prepared an application under the old law for service disability, and that application was pending at the time this bill was introduced in the House. After that time he was examined on application for pension under the old law, and the medical board found him to be disabled and entitled to a full rating under the law of 1890.

The only question before the Committee on Pensions was, therefore, whether they should send this soldier back to the office and there make his application under the law of 1890, or whether it should do simple justice, inasmuch as the bill was pending, and make a favorable recommendation of $12 a month. That was the only question about it. He is entitled to a pension, there is no doubt of the fact; and it was simply whether we would allow it in this expeditious manner or send him back. I believe the committee were unanimous in the recommendation.

Mr. GROUT. Would it be necessary to make another application under the act of 1890?

Mr. ANDREWS. Yes; under the rules of the Department.

Mr. KERR. He had made application under that law, the law of 1890, and was rejected. Afterwards, as I have said, on an application under the old law, it appeared on examination that he was disabled and entitled to the pension.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. LOUDENSLAGER) was read, as follows:

The Committtee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1513) entitled "A bill granting a pension to Caroline Wilkinson," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

The claimant is the daughter of John Spears, who served as a private for fifteen months in the regiment commanded by Colonel Goode, Virginia Line, war of the Revolution. The service is a matter of record, and he was a pensioner on account of same until his death, in 1842. His widow, Susanna Spears, was also a pensioner until her death.

Mrs. Wilkinson, the claimant, is a widow, 75 years old, in indigent circumstances, and dependent upon others for support.

The relationship of the claimant to the soldier is shown by the sworn statements of John S. Sims, William Phaup, and other aged citizens of Chesterfield County, Va.

The claimant resides at Pilkinton, Chesterfield County, Va.

There are several precedents for the proposed legislation, and in view of the claimant's great age and dependent circumstances, your committee believe that such precedents may very properly be followed in this case.

The SPEAKER. How old would the father of this beneficiary be if he were now alive?

William Cherry's company, Fourth Virginia Regiment of Foot, commanded by Cols. Robert Lawson and Thomas Elliott, Revolutionary war, at the rate of $20 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension law.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "twenty," in line 8, and substitute therefor the word "twelve," so as to fix the rating at $12 per month.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about this being the widow of a Revolutionary soldier, nor is there any doubt of its being a meritorious case. She is an old woman, about 73 years of age. This House has passed a number of bills of this character, and I trust this bill will pass and not be laid aside.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the gentleman in one statement, and that is that this is not the widow of a Revolutionary soldier, but she is the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier.

The SPEAKER. How old is this beneficiary?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the record shows she is about 71 or 72 years of age.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. She is 70 years old.

Mr. ANDERSON. Seventy years old.

The SPEAKER. How old would the father have been if he were alive?

Mr. DALZELL. When did this Revolutionary soldier cease to take care of this daughter.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no doubt of this being a Revolutionary soldier. He was wounded at Kings Mountain. There are affidavits showing his service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. This is extending the pensioning power of the Government down to the lineal descendants of Revolutionary soldiers pretty far.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This is simply following the precedents of the Fifty-third Congress in this Congress by the passage of numerous bills of this character, all of which I believe are wrong in principle. The precedent has been established, but in my judgment it should be overruled; and if any pension of this character is to be given it should be under a general law. It is best not to take up and defeat this bill at the present time, and I think it is impossible to pass a general bill, but I think that we ought to lay these bills aside for the present and until the House is ready to act advisedly on the whole question; because I do not believe it is the purpose or the policy of this House or the duty of this Government to pension the daughters, the granddaughters, the great-granddaughters, and the great great-granddaughters of any who may have been in the service of the Government. It is wrong in principle. As a member of the committee, I have fought the passage of these bills until the precedent has been established, and the consequence of fighting them seems to be simply to select a few and pension those, and leave the others out; so that they have brought it down to a specified amount of $12 a month and proof of the record of the soldier, and have left the House itself to judge whether it was wise to pass it. The question has never been raised.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly this would appear to be a good opportunity to overturn a bad precedent.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not know why this particular beneficiary should be singled out as the object of opposition. I appreciate the fact suggested that it may be very much more meritorious and very much better than others, and that is why I think we should pass a general law on the subject if there are to be pensions of this kind granted.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. With pleasure.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it not a fact that the record shows that this is a meritorious case, if any of these cases ought to pass?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It is, perhaps, as meritorious as many others of this kind.

Mr. ANDERSON. This old lady is 70 years of age. She is now supported by the charity of her neighbors. We have a number of precedents of cases like this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks that the bill be laid aside without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

GEORGE W. FERREE.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10040) granting an increase of pension to George W. Ferree.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand. This is a very urgent case, and I earnestly hope it will pass; and, while the engrossed copy will only delay the passage of the bill a short time, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ERDMAN. I withdraw the demand in this case.

The bill was accordingly engrossed, read a third time, and passed.

HANNAH E. RODGERS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the action just taken by the House with reference to the last Revolutionary widow bill, I move to reconsider the vote by which a bill was passed a little while ago in the case of Hannah E. Rodgers (H. R. 1832), so that it may be put in the same category with the others that are being passed over.

MRS. LUCY ALEXANDER PAYNE.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1501) to increase the pension of Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne.

The bill was read.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. COFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1501) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne, have considered the same, and report:

The claimant in this case, Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne, is the widow of Capt. J. Scott Payne, Fifth United States Cavalry, who graduated from the United States Military Academy and was appointed second lieutenant, Fifth Cavalry, June 18, 1866; promoted first lieutenant May 23, 1867; resigned September 12, 1868. Appointed second lieutenant, Sixth Cavalry, February 3, 1873, and first lieutenant September 8, 1874. Promoted to captain June 4, 1875, and retired as of that rank April 24, 1886, on account of disability originating in the line of his duty.

Captain Payne's record is a very honorable one, and he rendered very brilliant and gallant service in the campaign against the Utes, especially in what is known as the Milk River fight, wherein the gallant Major Thornburgh lost his life. After the fall of Major Thornburgh the command devolved upon Captain Payne, who made a gallant and successful resistance against overwhelming numbers of Indians, bringing his command out of the dangerous position with great credit. He was particularly mentioned by his commanding officer for his conduct in this affair, and was recommended for promotion, which, for some reason, never came to him.

He was twice wounded during the fight referred to, and was a great sufferer before his death. His widow is now in feeble health, suffering from the strain brought on by her faithful attendance on her husband during his last illness. She is without means and dependent upon her pension for the support of herself and two minor children.

Captain Payne died December 19, 1895, from disease originating in the service, and his widow is now receiving the pension of $20 per month provided by the general law.

In view of the conspicuous and valuable service rendered to his country by the deceased officer, and in the light of the widow's invalid condition and pressing necessities, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by fixing the rate of pension at $30 per month.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MALACHI SALTERS.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9319) granting a pension to Malachi Salters, a sergeant of Company F, Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill and the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House were read.

Mr. TALBERT. Let us hear the report.

The report (as already published) was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, upon this bill or some other I desire to occupy a moment or two in order to submit a suggestion. I wish to call attention to a case on which this House has already passed, and on which, of course, no further action can be taken at present. But I wish to bring the subject to the attention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which, as I know, aims at all times to deal out equal and exact justice to all pensioners.

In a case which the House has just passed, the widow of the late General Stoneman is an applicant for a pension, and that bill, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee, fixes the pension at $30 a month. Yesterday there was brought up for consideration here a bill to pension the widow of General Carr. The Senate had passed the bill at $100 a month; the House passed it at $50 a month. Of course, we know that in the "shuffle" that pension will come out at the rate of $75. The members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions have repeatedly stated that they think the widows of general officers should receive pensions at the rate of $50 a month. That seems to be the generally expressed sentiment.

Now, permit me to say that General Stoneman was as gallant a soldier as any person whose case has ever come before this body for consideration; and while I do not appear here as the advocate of large pensions, while I would not, if I had been present, have offered an amendment to that bill to make the pension $50, yet I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if they want to do equity in these cases, then when this bill gets into conference the same measure of justice should be extended to the widow of General Stoneman that has been extended to the widow of many a general officer of whom none of us ever heard.

It was my fortune, Mr. Speaker, to serve under General Stoneman. As many of you remember, he was not during the war an ordinary brigadier-general, commanding a brigade, but he had intrusted to him separate commands of great importance. He served with great distinction during the war in the Army of the Potomac, and subsequently he was sent to the West.

Now, when that case goes into conference, I hope—I do not state this as a request on my own part, but submit it as a matter of equal justice—I hope the members of that committee who may be on the conference committee will see fit to equalize these pensions along the whole line.

General Stoneman, it is true, was at one time the Democratic governor of the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. I hope that fact had no influence whatever in prompting the committee to reduce the pension of his widow to $30 a month. I repeat the hope that the conference committee may mete out to this woman the same measure of justice that is meted out to others.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] that I indorse every word he has said. While there was some disagreement in our committee on this subject, I was personally in favor of amending the bill referred to so as to give Mrs. Stoneman a pension of $50 a month. I knew General Stoneman in the same relation as did the gentleman from California, having served under his command; and I hope the conference committee will, as suggested by the gentleman from California, fix this pension at $50.

Mr. LOUD. I am satisfied that if the House understands the case it will sustain that position.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 8886) for the relief of Hiram T. Corum and Silas W. Davis, of Oregon; when the Speaker signed the same.

ANNA G. VALK.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7055) increasing the pension of Anna G. Valk, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments were read.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like some gentleman to explain something of this bill, and tell us why the widow of a surgeon in the Army is to have $40 a month, nearly what the widow of a brigadier-general gets. If there is any reason for it, I should like to know it, for it does not appear in the report; and why this large pension is granted I have no means of ascertaining.

I move to strike out "forty" and insert "twenty" in the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ANDREWS. I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that the beneficiary of this bill is receiving now a pension of $25 a month. The amendment makes this bill $20 a month.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

NANCY ROBERTS.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8633) granting a pension to Nancy Roberts, of Manchester, Clay County, Ky.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The report was read at length.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECONSIDERATION.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, a motion to reconsider the several votes taken was laid on the table.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. During the debate on last Monday on the bill for the relief of Joseph E. Vantine, a bill having been presented for the increase of his pension, it seemed to me, from the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], that a sort of insinuation was dropped that for the sake of getting my bill through the House I was willing to pervert the facts of history.

The report on that bill asserted that Joseph Vantine was the first one who ever suggested the use of chain armor over the sides of a ship to protect it from the missiles of the enemy. The gentleman from California rose and said that that honor belonged to Admiral Farragut. Now, I wish to read to the House a letter from Admiral Farragut which I think will explain itself. He says:

Mr. Moore—

Meaning Chief Engineer John W. Moore—

is the gentleman whom I mentioned in my official letter as the originator of the cladding of ships with chain cables, and has always been spoken of by his commander as a man of great merit, both in and out of his profession.

D. G. FARRAGUT.

In order to set myself right, I would refer the House to pages 322 and 323 of Bennett's Steam Navy of the United States, which gives a pretty full history of this affair. This is an able volume, which is considered authority, and which I have in my desk, so that any gentleman can refer to it who is pleased to take the trouble.

Mr. John W. Moore, chief engineer, reported to Admiral Farragut, or suggested to him, the use of chain cables to protect ships from the missiles of the enemy. The officers of the Richmond claim that the idea originated on that ship, and that Assistant Engineer Eben Hoyt suggested the idea in the first instance to Mr. Moore; and the same officers claimed that Joe Vantine, the man whose name was embodied in the bill I offered in the House, was the first to suggest it to Eben Hoyt.

One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker, that Admiral Farragut did not claim the honor, and those who honor his history have never claimed it for him.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not desire to raise any question of order, but simply to call the attention of the gentleman from Delaware to the fact that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is not now present.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, he was present five minutes ago. What am I to do? Cork up and hush? [Laughter.] It is not my business to keep him here. I do not intend to say anything to traduce the character of Mr. LOUD, or to reflect upon him in any manner whatever. It is a matter of contest between the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and myself as to the facts of history, that is all. I do not want to appear before this House as adopting a subterfuge, and thereby perverting the facts of history for the sake of getting a pension bill through here, for anybody. The man who suspects me of anything like that, does not know his man, that is all. [Laughter and applause.]

What I want to say is this, Mr. Speaker: My feelings, my sentiments, are so much involved in a matter of this kind that I wish it known that I would be the last man in this world to tear a single leaf from the laurel crown which binds the brow of that great naval officer, Admiral Farragut. He needs no defense from me. He needs no apology or defense from the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]. In his lifetime and after he had passed away from this scene of action neither he nor his friends demanded that his fame should be plastered over with the veneering of any man's achievements. He was great in himself. His fame is secure, his name is immortal, and I glory in it, and I glory in the ladder by which he climbed to fame. I would decorate every rung of that ladder with oriflamme of victory, and when he had ascended to the apex I would stand and shout while they crowned him before the eyes of an admiring world. But, sir, if I knew the man that built the ladder I would bow in homage before him, and when he died I would cover his grave with flowers and bedew it with the tears of holy devotion.

Sir, what I protest against is the seeming disposition to deny to the humble and obscure the honor which justly belongs to them. I am reminded of a little story in ancient history which you and I have both read. There was once a great general who was a leper, and not a great many miles away was a certain prophet, dwelling in the hills of Samaria. In the household of this great general there was a slave Jewess, a little maiden who sympathized with the sufferings of her lord, who went to her mistress and suggested that if her master would only go down to Samaria and appeal to that great prophet he would be healed of his leprosy. The wife suggested it to her husband and persuaded him to go down. He went, and the prophet came to the door and told him to go and wash in the Jordan, which he did and was healed.

Now, if the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] had had the writing of that story he would have covered the prophet and the general with glory, and with grudging forgetfulness would have put out of sight the little slave Jewess, who started the wheels to turning and brought prophet and general together. I am not one of that kind. [Applause and laughter.] I want it remembered that God in His great wisdom and power sometimes chooses the weak things of the earth to confound the mighty, and the things that are not to bring to naught the things that are.

Let not ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, their destiny obscure;
Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
The short and simple annals of the poor.

[Applause.]

I assert here to-day that the first suggestion for chain armor for ships of war came out of the fire hole of the ship Richmond, and the first lips that uttered it were the lips of old Joe Vantine. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the vote, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PITNEY, for this evening's session, on account of important business.

To Mr. VAN HORN, for this evening, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WILBER, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. STAHLE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. COBB, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GILLET of New York, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LINNEY, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CODDING, for four days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. RUSK, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition filed with the bill to grant a pension to H. Frederick Fisher, a soldier in the Mexican war, there being no adverse report on said bill.

The motion of Mr. THOMAS was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., the Speaker announcing that the evening session would be devoted to the consideration of business in order at Friday evening sessions under the rule, and that the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, would occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. PAYNE as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall, on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar under the rule.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Pending that, I offer the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bills be considered in the following order: The Clerk to call the first bill on the Calendar, announce the number of it, the Calendar number, and the name of the member who introduced it, and upon his failure to respond "Present," the bill to be passed without prejudice and the next bill to be called in the same way; Senate bills to be called in regular order as they appear on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

COL. JOHN TAYLOR WOOD.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I would state that I have a bill here for the removal of the political disabilities of a grandson of old Zachary Taylor, and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary instructed me to take the first chance to call it up in the House. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It will take but a moment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2746) to remove the political disabilities of Col. John Taylor Wood.

Be it enacted, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed from Col. John Taylor Wood.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LACEY in the chair.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I want unanimous consent to consider a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Let me make a statement to the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is doing business under a special order of the House. The House has directed the order of the business.

MARY L. TWEDDLE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5793) granting a pension to Mary L. Tweddle.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States the name of Mrs. Mary L. Tweddle, widow of William Tweddle, late captain of Company K, Tenth Kentucky Volunteers, and to pay her a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ERDMAN. I desire that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The report (by Mr. ANDERSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5793) granting a pension to Mary L. Tweddle, submit the following report:

William Tweddle, the husband of this petitioner, served as captain of Company K, Tenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, from November 2, 1861, until August 7, 1862, when his resignation, tendered by reason of having contracted rheumatism, affecting the back and lower extremities, was accepted.

He was pensioned by the Pension Office at the rate of $5 per month from discharge; $15 from May 13, 1882, and $20 from March 24, 1886, on account of lumbago and chronic diarrhea, and, as will be seen by the foregoing rates, his disability gradually increased until he was allowed the total of his rank as a captain.

He died August 22, 1892, of congestion of the brain.

The petitioner applied to the Pension Bureau for a pension under the general laws, furnishing medical testimony that Captain Tweddle's death was due to the lumbago or rheumatism for which he was pensioned, and also the certificate of the board of health, made upon the return of the attending physician, showing that the primary cause of death was congestion of the brain and the remote cause rheumatism and diarrhea, but the claim was rejected in the Pension Bureau upon the ground that it was not shown from a medical standpoint that the cause of death was due to the disabilities for which this officer was pensioned.

Both the officer and the petitioner had been previously married, and the fact of death of the former consorts was duly shown in evidence on file in the Pension Office.

The petitioner married the officer on January 5, 1891, and consequently can have no status for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, which act requires that a widow of a soldier shall have been married to such soldier prior to the passage of such act.

The medical testimony furnished by Drs. Mannakee and Muncaster, of this city, physicians of high standing, shows that the congestion of brain was no doubt a result of the heart trouble from which the officer had suffered as a result of the rheumatism, which for a period had only affected the lumbar muscles, but became general thereafter.

Medical authorities admit that congestion of the brain, the result of impeded return of the blood from the head, may be caused by impediments within the circulation, such as disease of heart.

While the connection of the death cause with the pensioned disabilities may not have been sufficiently shown by the testimony of the attending physicians, your committee believe that the case from all its surroundings is such a one as to present equitable features, and do recommend that the bill be passed.

The petitioner is old and dependent upon the assistance of friends and a daughter, who is hardly able to assist her by reason of having a large family of her own to support.

Mr. EVANS. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ANTON ERNST.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8075) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Anton Ernst.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Anton Ernst, late of Company K, Second Maryland Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge, to date as of October 15, 1862.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, that is not my bill; but I introduced the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest that the Clerk call the title of the bill, and that a member may move that the bill be considered, otherwise that the bill be passed. I think that will be correct under the order. [Cries of "Oh no!"]

Mr. HULICK. Let the Clerk read the name of the member who introduced the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. A parliamentary inquiry. I want to know what becomes of the Senate bills that come from our Senators.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the order again to the committee, as a number of members have come in since the order was adopted.

The order was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the bill appears to have been introduced by him. Does he desire to have it passed without prejudice?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Anton Ernst, late of Company K, Second Maryland Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge, to date as of October 15, 1862.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I ask that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs be read.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4300) for the relief of Regina Ernst, having had the same under consideration, would report thereon as follows:

It appears that Regina Ernst is the widow of Anton Ernst, who, according to the report of the War Department, was enrolled September 5, 1861, as a private in Company K, Second Regiment Maryland Infantry, to serve three years, and appears to have served faithfully until August 31, 1862. The muster roll for September and October, 1862, reports him "Deserted from October 15, 1862." He never rejoined his company, although he owed service to September 5, 1864. The medical records furnish no information concerning him. In applying for a removal of the charge of desertion from the record by the War Department, Regina Ernst, on June 22, 1891, testified that in 1862, when she brought her husband home from the Army "under a furlough," he was an invalid, suffering from asthma, heart affection, and the effects of the hardships of the service; that he was never thereafter in a fit condition to return to the Army, and was an invalid on her hands for ten years after she brought him home, she having to support him during that time by her daily toil.

Under date of June 22, 1891, Comrade Boettger testified that he was second lieutenant of Ernst's company; that the said Ernst was a good, brave soldier, and never showed the slightest disposition to shirk his duty, always doing it manfully, and further corroborated so much of the widow's testimony as went to show that the soldier was suffering from a severe illness and was taken home "under a furlough."

On July 7, 1891, Angeline Wennig and Wendelin Kessler testified that they saw the soldier when he was brought home from the Army; that he was in very bad condition and seemed to be suffering from asthma and lung trouble, being hardly able to get his breath at all; that they were his neighbors and saw him frequently, and that he was never able to return to the service, being almost entirely helpless.

Philip Engerd, Daniel Cooper, and John Luber, on July 18, 1890, testified that they were members of the Second Maryland Infantry; that Ernst became very sick in the service, having a bad cough and difficulty in catching his breath—a wheezing way of breathing that was extremely noticeable on account of his unusual height; that his efforts to breathe caused him to bend over in a peculiar manner, and that he continued in this way "until discharge."

John Gerhard, on September 9, 1890, declared under oath that he served with Ernst, who, during the latter part of his service, suffered from a severe hacking cough and cold, brought on by exposure in the service.

George Lintenberger, on July 16, 1891, testified that he served with Ernst, and corroborates the statement of Gerhard.

John Luber again, on July 17, 1891, corroborates the statements, substantially, of the witnesses Angeline Wennig and Wendelin Kessler.

On August 29, 1891, Boettger, who also testified on June 22, 1891, stated, in reply to a letter from the War Department, that after the battle of Antietam, Md., September 17, 1862, when the regiment was encamped at Pleasant Valley, Ernst received a pass from First Lieut. F. W. Heck, then commanding the company, to go through the lines, he remembering the incident distinctly on account of the soldier's sickness. He further stated that he was not able to "diagnose fully" the nature of the soldier's ailment, but was impressed at the time with the fact that he was a very sick man; that he seemed to be suffering from asthma, lung affection, and general debility.

In reply to a letter addressed by the War Department to Louis Fleckenstein, late a lieutenant of Ernst's company, he stated, under date of September 5, 1891, that at and after the time said Ernst is shown by the records to have deserted he was an able-bodied man, and that he was charged with desertion according to the rules and discipline of war.

On July 17, 1891, Regina Ernst again testified that her husband was a well man before his enlistment; that he was taken very ill while in the service and sent for her; that he was suffering from asthma in a bad form and had treated himself, using anything that was suggested to him, hoping to obtain relief; that after he went home he was treated by affiant with "home remedies," as it was thought that a physician "would not be of much use;" that the spells would come on suddenly, and he would suffer terribly; that he had no intention of deserting, and had he been able would have returned to the service, but was not fit for any work after he went home, and that it was impossible for her to furnish medical testimony.

Hannibald Gutman and Henry Freund testified, under date of October 12, 1891, that this soldier was completely incapacitated from performing the duties of a soldier from the time he arrived home until the day of his death, in October, 1875, and that his wife supported him during this time; that Ernst was in good health when he enlisted, but was in wretched health after his return from the Army.

On October 18, 1893, Regina Ernst, then being 62 years of age, made an affidavit, which has been presented to your committee, wherein she stated that after the battle of Sharpsburg, or Antietam, she went to the battlefield to see her husband, who had been sick, but participated in the engagement, and that he carried the company colors; that when she got to the camp, about September 20, 1862, she found her husband very poorly, so she went to Captain Seedsburg and got a pass to go home, and her husband was so much worse next day that Lieutenant Heck went to the captain and talked to him, and the captain told Heck to give a furlough to her husband, with a pass for eight days, which he did, and then said if he was no better at the end of eight days tell him to stay till sent for; that she and her husband came to their home in Baltimore. When his eight days' furlough expired he was no better, nor did he ever get much better; that his disease soon developed into a severe case of asthma, and he never was able to go but a few blocks from their home or to do any work, and for twelve years was an invalid, and died of the disability in 1876; that he never did desert in any way, but came away with his furlough, accompanied by her, and with full consent and knowledge of his superior officers, and never was able to go back or do any duty again during the remainder of his life.

On September 15, 1894, Wanobatl Gutman, John H. Hoeck, and John Luber each testified of their personal knowledge that Anton Ernst was treated by one Dr. Troutman for several years after said Ernst returned home in September, 1862, until the death of Dr. Troutman, and corroborates the statement of the widow as to her husband's ill condition of health until his death, and the witness Gutman also corroborates the widow as to the fact that she supported her husband and family by her own labors until the time of his death.

Your committee, after a careful review of the testimony, has arrived at the conclusion that the failure of the soldier Anton Ernst to return to his command and serve out the term of his enlistment and receive an honorable discharge was due to his serious illness, which so disabled him as to render him incapable of returning to his regiment.

All the sworn testimony supports this conclusion, and the only statement which militates against the same is the one made by Louis Fleckenstein, late a lieutenant of Ernst's company, which is not, in the report of the War Department, stated to have been under oath, and hence your committee are unwilling that such statement should outweigh all the sworn statements supporting the conclusion at which the committee has arrived. It appears to your committee that the soldier left his command by permission, and hence no intention of deserting existed at that time, and during the remainder of the term of his enlistment his condition was such as to excuse him from returning to his command.

Your committee therefore submit the following as a substitute bill, and recommend that the same do pass:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Anton Ernst, late of Company K, Second Maryland Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge, to date as of October 15, 1862."

Mr. McCLELLAN. May I ask my colleague on the committee a question? Is the captain who is referred to in this report dead?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is the captain who is referred to in that report dead? A comrade says that that captain told the husband of the claimant, the beneficiary in this bill, to go home for eight days, and that if he was not better, to stay until sent for. Now, there is nothing to show this from any of the company's officers. Is the captain dead? If he is living, it would be a very simple thing to get an affidavit from him. Nothing appears here from the officers of the company.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As this is a favorable report, there is no question, from the habits and custom of the committee, to believe other than that it is a meritorious case. I think the very points which the gentleman from New York calls attention to were abundantly covered by the proof in this case. It will be observed that there are a number of affidavits, and the points to which reference is made are material, and the committee came to the conclusion that a favorable report should be made. I think the report was drawn a long time ago, and I have no personal recollection respecting it. I am satisfied that the question was abundantly supported by proof.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If my colleague is satisfied, that is sufficient, as I know he investigates all cases before his subcommittee very carefully.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am satisfied.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HARRIET M. KNOWLTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 719) to restore a pension to Harriet M. Knowlton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harriet M. Knowlton, widow of the late Major Knowlton, of the Twenty-ninth Maine Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 719) to restore a pension to Harriet M. Knowlton, adopt as their own the attached Senate report (No. 194) and report the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass.

SENATE REPORT.

The claimant in this case, Harriet M. Knowlton, widow of Major Knowlton, of the Twenty-ninth Maine Volunteer Infantry, asks to be restored to the pension rolls, and supports her claim by the following statement of facts: Harriet M. Knowlton, married at Lewiston, Me., on January 29, 1854, to William Knowlton, who was afterwards major of the Twenty-ninth Regiment Infantry, Maine Volunteers, and was killed at the head of his regiment September 19, 1864.

Mrs. Knowlton received a widow's pension of $25 per month until her second marriage, to Albin B. Stinchfield in November, 1867. On May 25, 1889, she obtained a divorce from said Stinchfield on the ground of desertion, he having left her and not having furnished her any support for more than twelve years. The judgment and decree of divorce authorized her to take and resume her former name of Harriet M. Knowlton. Mrs. Knowlton is now in her sixty-fourth year, and her only means of support is by nursing, which employment has furnished her only support for the past twelve years.

The statement as to the divorce is fully and properly proved, as is shown by a certificate from C. B. Terrell, clerk of the district court, which shows that the case was placed on the calendar May 25, 1889, at special term, and that it came on for trial the same time, and judgment was rendered in her behalf that plaintiff resume her former name of Harriet M. Knowlton.

In view of the honorable record of her former husband, his gallant services during the war, and his death while in active service at the head of his regiment, and the fact that she was in receipt of a pension after his death and prior to her second marriage, and ample proof of her release from her second husband by the divorce proceedings, and the further fact that she is now poor and unable to earn a full living, the committee therefore deem it proper that she be restored to the rolls and granted a pension of $25 per month, and that the bill be passed.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that that bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

PETER ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2035) granting an increase of pension to Peter Anderson, of Strong City, Kans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Peter Anderson, of Strong City, Kans., late of Company C, Sixtieth United States Colored Infantry, and pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him, said increase of pension to be paid subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2035) granting an increase of pension to Peter Anderson, of Strong City, Kans., submit the following report:

Peter Anderson, for whom an increase of pension is asked by this bill, is now drawing a pension of $12 a month. It is shown by the records of the War Department that he served in Company C, Sixtieth United States Colored Infantry.

It is shown by the affidavits on file that while working in a stone quarry at Ottawa, Kans., July 18, 1887, by a premature blast he lost both his arms—one at the elbow and the other above it. He has no means of support but his pension and what he receives from selling apples at trains. He carries the apples in a basket suspended from his shoulders by a strap. He has a large family depending on him for support, and frequently is compelled to ask the county for aid.

He is a sober, honest, trustworthy colored man of good moral character. In view of his condition and his service, we recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

In line 7 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, it is very necessary that some formal amendment be made in this bill in order to perfect it, and I offer them for that purpose.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line 4, strike out "increase the pension" and insert "place upon the pension roll, subject otherwise to the provisions and regulations of the pension laws."

Line 5, strike out "Strong City, Kans."

Line 5, after the word "late," insert "private."

Line 8, strike out all after the word "him."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Peter Anderson."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a bill that ought not to be reported favorably by this committee. The applicant is receiving now $12 a month. Twenty-two years after the war he lost his arms by a premature explosion. There is no pretext anywhere that that was the result in any way of disability incurred in the service. It was simply a misfortune, and if this poor unfortunate man can not get along in the world it is the duty of the community in which he resides to take care of him. It is not the duty of the American nation, and it is not to the credit of that community that they let him come here to ask the charity of the nation. I move that this bill be laid on the table.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Will the gentleman who introduced this bill [Mr. CURTIS of Kansas] let me ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Is there any claim made that this disability is the result directly or indirectly of the man's service in the Army?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. None whatever; but there are quite a number of precedents for bills of this character. We have passed half a dozen of them in this Congress.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I do not doubt that. I am asking simply for information. It appears, then, Mr. Chairman, that this is pure gratuity.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. ERDMAN, to lay the bill on the table; and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 84.

The amendment recommended in the last paragraph of the report was adopted.

The amendments offered by Mr. THOMAS were then agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WASHINGTON BAKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4517) granting a pension to Washington Baker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Washington Baker, of Girard, Kans., late of Company H, Eighty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4517) granting a pension to Washington Baker, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

The soldier, Washington Baker, was late a private in Company H, Eighty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and was enrolled on the 11th day of August, 1862, and discharged January 6, 1865. The soldier is now drawing a pension of $12 a month under act of 1890. His claim for pension under act of June 14, 1862, was rejected for the reason, as alleged, that the soldier's disability (that of total blindness) was not due to his military service; that his eyes were defective when he entered the Army. The soldier alleges that at Murfreesboro, Tenn., in the month of January, 1863, he contracted a severe cold, resulting in pneumonia, followed by a diseased condition of the eyes. He also alleges that subsequently, while in an engagement soon thereafter, he was standing behind a brick chimney and firing therefrom, when a cannon ball passed through the chimney, filling his eyes with sand and lime dust, which added very much to their already diseased condition.

These allegations are abundantly supported by his comrades, two of these testifying that they were with him in the hospital at the time of the diseased condition of his eyes and subsequently, and that he was compelled to wear goggles a great portion of the time. The testimony, which is voluminous, satisfies your committee beyond question that the claimant's eyes at the time he entered the service were perfectly sound and free from disease, and remained in that condition until he contracted pneumonia, and that subsequent to that time his eyes were continually in a diseased condition. The disease progressed until the eyeballs were swollen and protruded from the lids of the eyes; and while in this condition the claimant was working in his field and received an injury to one of his eyes by a cornstalk, but did not regard the matter as serious and continued his work for a day or so. Soon thereafter he was forced to abandon the same and send for a doctor. His physician, on examining his eye, found it filled with pus, and, there being no hope of restoring it, decided to remove it for the purpose of saving the other eye. This was done. The other eye improved apparently for some time, but again grew worse, until the ball burst, leaving the claimant totally blind.

Your committee believe, from the testimony on file in the Pension Office, and in fact the physician who removed the eye gave it as his opinon, that the injury received to the eye in the cornfield was due to its swollen and inflamed condition and the inability of the claimant to see objects, and that the accident would not have occurred had the claimant's eyes been sound; that the loss of claimant's eyes is directly traceable to his army service, and that no fair-minded man can read the testimony and reach a different conclusion. Your committee therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, some formal amendments are required to perfect this bill also, and I send them to the desk.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out the words "of Girard, Kans."

In line 7, after the word "late," insert "a private."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, in this case the applicant lost his eye by its coming in contact with a cornstalk many years after the war. The principle here is in line with that involved in the last bill—the principle of pensioning, not for disabilities contracted in the service, but for injuries incurred long after the war. It is quite apparent, from the recommendation of bills of this character, that the committee is willing this evening to let anything and everything go through.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Will my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. KIRKPATRICK], answer a question?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Certainly.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Is it not a fact that the present Commissioner of Pensions has recently held that when a soldier was accepted during the war, the Government is estopped from setting up the defense that he was unsound at the time he entered the service? Has not the present Commissioner modified the former rule in that respect?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not know. That has not been the rule heretofore.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. It was not the rule under the previous Commissioner, but my impression is that the present Commissioner has modified the rule in that way.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not know about that, but he ought to have done so.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. He ought not to have done so, but he has.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN], I desire to call attention to the fact that under the management of the Pension Bureau the regularly organized board of examiners in that Bureau, sworn officers, have found that this soldier's disability of total blindness is not due to his military service, but that his eyes were defective when he entered the Army. Further down, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the fact is set forth that this man was plowing in his field one day, when his eye was struck by a cornstalk, which injured his eyesight still more. He was not in the Army at that time, of course.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. The Government took this man and put him into the Army. Even if he had defective sight, they accepted him to fight for his country, and, with his defective sight, he served three years, I believe.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not dispute that.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. In view of that fact, is there any equity in denying him relief now that he is totally disabled?

Mr. TALBERT. That is another question entirely, which I am not now discussing.

Mr. MCCLELLAN (to Mr. TALBERT). The question of the gentleman from New Jersey is in line with the plank in the platform adopted at Chicago last summer. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, well, the gentleman knows, I guess, that that platform was made to get in on, and not to stand on afterwards. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, there is a regularly organized medical board in the Pension Bureau, composed of sworn officers, who find, under the responsibility of their oaths, that this man's disability can not be traced to service origin. That is not gainsaid. That is the record of the Pension Department. Again, it is shown by the man's own evidence that his eyes were further injured by being struck by a cornstalk, and the physician who examined him gives it as his opinion—does not swear to it, does not even certify to it—merely gives it as his opinion that the injury done by the cornstalk was owing to the swollen and inflamed condition of the eye at the time.

Now, it seems to me that any statements which should influence the committee to vote for a claim of this kind ought to be backed up by sworn evidence, and should not be the mere ipse dixit of any man, especially when that testimony is used to rebut the finding of a sworn court specially organized to examine these matters and find the facts upon oath. I have given you the finding of the medical board of the Pension Office, and that is contradicted only by the mere statement of, you may say, a layman, not a Government officer at all. It does seem to me that that is insufficient evidence to justify the passage of this claim. These are my views, and I feel it my duty to state them and to enter my protest against the passage of this claim.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. One word, Mr. Chairman. The testimony on file in the Invalid Pensions Committee room abundantly shows that this man's sight was sound when he entered the Army. There is no sort of question in my mind that this disability was incurred originally in the service, and no man can read the testimony and doubt that fact.

The amendments proposed by Mr. THOMAS were adopted.

The question being taken on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 2.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN M. LAUGHLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7688) for the relief of John M. Laughlin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John M. Laughlin, late a private of Lieut. George Melick's detachment, Twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $20 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "and pay him a pension of $20 per month."

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7688) for the relief of John M. Laughlin, having carefully considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

Said soldier duly enlisted and was duly enrolled, examined, and sworn in as a private of Lieut. George Melick's detachment, Twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, on the 1st day of October, 1862, at Columbus, Ohio, and actually served as such soldier in said detachment until the 31st day of January, 1863, when he was discharged at Cairo, Ill., by reason of surgeon's certificate of disability, and a certificate of honorable discharge was duly issued and delivered to him. No records of the actual muster of said soldier can be found.

The records of the Auditor for the Treasury Department state that the soldier, John M. Laughlin, was paid from enlistment, October 1, 1862, Sidney, Ohio, to discharge, January 31, 1863, Cairo, Ill., four months; and twenty-one days' travel; 420 miles travel from place of discharge home. He received $71.44 on account of the aforesaid service.

Said soldier never reenlisted.

On the 23d day of January, 1865, this soldier was granted a pension of $2.66 per month, commencing from January 31, 1863, the date of his discharge (certificate 87290), by reason of aphonia, complicated with chronic bronchitis, contracted in the service. He continued to draw this pension until the 4th of March, 1867, when he voluntarily relinquished the same and returned his pension certificate and blank voucher to the Pension Bureau. Soldier states he did so because he had partially recovered from his disabilities, and because of the smallness of the pension allowed him.

On the 22d day of October, 1890, said soldier filed an application for the restoration of his pension and increase of same, and also an application under the act of June 27, 1890. Both of these claims were rejected on the 13th day of April, 1893, on the grounds that the records of the War Department fail to show that the name of said soldier is borne on the rolls of any company of the Twentieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. The Commissioner of Pensions further states to said soldier, as a further cause for the rejection of his claim, as follows:

"There being no record of your muster in, you can not be recognized as having been properly in the service of the United States."

All of the foregoing facts are clearly shown by the official records and sworn testimony now on file in the Pension Office.

Inasmuch, therefore, as said soldier was duly enlisted and enrolled, and actually served as such soldier for four months, and received an honorable discharge, your committee are clearly of the opinion that he is justly and equitably entitled to a pensionable status the same as if he had been actually mustered, and do therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

Strike out the words "and pay him a pension of $20 per month."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it appears that the records of the War Department do not show that this soldier was ever in the Army. But there is another record showing that he was in the Army and rendered good service.

The records of the Auditor of the Treasury Department state that the soldier, John M. Laughlin, was paid from enlistment, October 1, 1862, Sidney, Ohio, to discharge, January 31, 1863, Cairo, Ill., four months; and twenty-one days' travel; 420 miles travel from place of discharge home. He received $71.44 on account of the aforesaid service.

It thus appears that this man rendered service and was paid therefor; so that the technical objection that his service does not appear in the records of the War Department ought not to defeat what appears to be a just claim.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I call my friend's attention to the fact that this soldier, as it appears, was honorably discharged, and that the State from which he came was Ohio.

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, he was honorably discharged; and although the records of the War Department do not show that he was ever mustered in, yet the fact is shown otherwise that he was mustered in and rendered service; that he was once granted a pension, which he surrendered because he had recovered from the disability, thus showing that he is an honest and upright man. I think this is a just claim and should receive the favorable consideration of this committee. This is one of those honest claims which I think ought to be granted. It appears that the man can not obtain a pension by going to the Pension Bureau—that the only place where he can obtain justice is this House. I am in favor of the bill because it is proper and right; and a bill of this kind is the only method by which the soldier can receive the relief to which he is entitled. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. MEREDITH. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. TALBERT. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will sit down and let this just bill pass before the man dies.

Mr. MEREDITH. I wanted to ask my friend a question.

Mr. TALBERT. I will answer the gentleman's question if I can, though some people can ask questions which others can not answer.

Mr. MEREDITH. Did my friend observe that the gentleman who introduced this bill is the one who makes the report in its favor? What does my friend think of that?

Mr. TALBERT. The records of the Auditor for the Treasury Department show that this soldier rendered service and was paid for it; and even if the report was written by the gentleman who introduced the bill, that gentleman is an honorable and distinguished member of this House, who would not report anything that he did not believe to be true and right. I am willing to vote for the bill upon his responsibility.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY O. HYRE.

The next business on the Private Colendar was the bill (H. R. 7079) to increase the pension of Henry O. Hyre.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Henry O. Hyre, late a private in Battery E, First West Virginia Light Artillery, from and after the passage of this act, a pension at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of the pension now allowed to him.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 6, the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7079) to increase the pension of Henry O. Hyre, having carefully considered the evidence, report as follows:

This soldier enlisted as a private in Battery E, West Virginia Volunteer Light Artillery, August 4, 1862, and was honorably discharged June 28, 1865. He is now drawing a pension of $6 per month under act of June 27, 1890. He filed in 1884 an application under the general law, which was rejected in January, 1896, on the ground of claimant's inability to prove origin in service of alleged injury of left knee, chronic diarrhea, piles, rheumatism, and disease of heart, and of no ratable disability from alleged injury of left ankle and deafness since filing claim. This action, rejecting the claim under the general law, appears to have been proper, but it appears from the evidence that claimant is entitled to a higher rate under the act of June 27, 1890, than he is now receiving.

The examining board at Lima, Ohio, under date of March 13, 1895, concluded the report of their examination of him as follows:

"This claimant is disabled in a degree equivalent to the loss of a leg at the knee."

M. L. Johnston, M. D., of Harrod, Ohio, in affidavit dated February 5, 1896, testifies that he has known claimant eleven years; has known him to have nasal catarrh and deafness of left ear; has treated him for same. He also has rheumatism, heart disease, and chronic diarrhea; knows this by observation and examination as neighbor and physician. He is not able to do any amount of manual labor. His wife has been bedridden for five years.

Under date of February 7, 1896, J. H. Huntley, M. D., of Lima, Ohio, testifies to treatment of the claimant, describes his disabilities, and concludes:

"I consider his disability for manual labor total. He is both an invalid and a cripple. He has no property or means of support."

In the opinion of your committee, the condition described warrants an allowance of $12 per month under act of June 27, 1890, and they therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "twenty," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve," and that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SOLOMON KLINE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7073) to increase the pension of Solomon Kline.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Solomon Kline, late of Company I, Forty-sixth Indiana Infantry, upon the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "month," in line 6, and insert "in lieu of the pension which he is now receiving."

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us hear the report.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7073) to increase the pension of Solomon Kline, having thoroughly examined the evidence on file, beg leave to report:

Solomon Kline enlisted in Company I, Forty-sixth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, November 30, 1861, and was discharged therefrom October 7, 1863, on surgeon's certificate of disability. The medical records show that he was treated for malarial fever from October 16 to October 23, and from December 11 to December 28, 1862; that he was wounded at Champion Hill, Miss., May 16, 1863, and was treated May 16, 1863, for gunshot wound, severe, flesh, of both thighs; again June 10 to 13, 1863, gunshot, left thigh, and June 14 to July 10, 1863, gunshot wound of thigh.

The certificate of disability on which he was discharged shows that the surgeon found him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of gunshot wound of both hips, the ball entering the middle of the left natis, passing obliquely to the right and front, passing through the pelvis, and coming out on the front of the right thigh 2 inches below the inferior anterior spinous process of the ileum; not able for field duty, and not physically suitable to enter or reenlist in the Invalid Corps; disability total; paralysis of right limb.

Affidavits recently filed with this committee show condition as follows:

Mrs. A. Sperling testifies that she has seen Kline almost daily, and his condition is such that he is confined to the house and needs attendance most of the time.

Charles J. Brindley testifies that he has known Kline ten years, and that he is now and has been confined to his house for the greater portion of five years, and that he requires the assistance of another person, by reason of gunshot wound in both hips, and that when he is around the house has always needed crutches to walk with.

Dr. L. A. Bassett, of Swanton, Ohio, testifies that he has known claimant about twenty years; that he is totally unable to do any manual labor whatever, and is confined to the house, unable to dress or get along without assistance most of the time, on account of gunshot wound in hip, paralyzing one limb, rendering it useless.

This man is now pensioned at $30 per month for gunshot wound of both hips and chronic diarrhea and resulting disease of rectum. He was examined August 7, 1895, at Wauseon, Ohio, by the board of United States examining surgeons in a claim for increase, and in their report they say:

"He is evidently unable to walk without crutch and cane; * * * evidently needs the assistance of another person part of the time. In our judgment this claimant is permanently disabled for the performance of any manual labor, and requires the frequent and periodical, though not regular and constant, personal aid and attendance of another person."

In spite of this report of the local examining board, the claim for increase was rejected on the ground that the claimant was receiving the full amount to which entitled for the disabilities for which pensioned.

Your committee are of opinion that this report of the Wauseon (Ohio) board, corroborated as it is by the testimony of the claimant's near neighbors, who see him every day, and by that of his physician, who knows his condition from personal observation and treatment, shows that he requires the frequent and periodical aid and attendance of another person, and that he is therefore entitled under the law to the rate of $50 per month; and they recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out all after the word "month," in line 6, and adding "in lieu of the pension which he is now receiving."

Mr. TALBERT. This is another bill introduced by the same patriotic and distinguished gentleman [Mr. LAYTON]. It appears that the claim is supported by certain affidavits which are recited in the report. In addition to these affidavits we have a certificate from the examining board of the Pension Bureau which states that the soldier "is evidently unable to walk without crutch and cane—evidently needs the assistance of another person part of the time." I think this is a highly meritorious claim. It should be passed without objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM C. ESTILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6497) granting a pension to William C. Estill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I ask that House bill No. 4184 (No. 989 on the Calendar) be substituted for the bill just called, and that the bill just reached be substituted on the Calendar for the one I desire to call up.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I hope the gentleman will not object. This arrangement does not postpone any bill in which any other gentleman is interested. I am simply asking that one bill take the place of the other. This arrangement will not interfere with the rights of any gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I ask unanimous consent for the arrangement I have just stated.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that would not be in order under the special rule.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This arrangement does not postpone any other bill or interfere with the rights of any other member.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the order of the House under which the Committee of the Whole is acting can not be changed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Can it not be done by unanimous consent? The proposition is simply that one bill be put in the place of another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that, as the House has directed the Committee of the Whole in regard to the order of business to be pursued this evening, that order must be followed. When the gentleman first made the request the Chair understood that it was the same beneficiary in each bill, but now ascertains that it is an entirely different bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Can we not as well take up No. 989 on the Calendar by unanimous consent as to make the order we have made about the manner of calling them up?

Mr. HICKS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That William C. Estill, disabled and dependent son of the late William J. Estill, deceased, who was captain of Company F, Twenty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, and a private in Company A, Sixteenth United States Infantry, in the Mexican war, be, and he is hereby, granted a pension at the rate of $12 a month, payable quarterly as other pensions.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6497) granting a pension to William C. Estill, submit the following report:

William C. Estill is the disabled son of William J. Estill, late captain Company F, Twenty-eighth Illinois Volunteers. He is 34 years of age. By reason of the premature discharge of a cannon at Petersburg, Ill., in 1868, at a public celebration, he lost both arms at elbow and his right eye. He has to be fed and waited on by an attendant. He has no property or means whatever, and no relatives able to support him. He is dependent on charity.

Petitioner's father, William J. Estill, was a private in Company A, Sixteenth United States Infantry, in the Mexican war. He was wounded in the battle of Shiloh so severely as to compel his discharge on or about June 10, 1863. For this wound he was pensioned up to the time of his death, in 1891. Petitioner's mother died in 1874.

Petitioner's great-grandfather, William Estill, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war from the State of New Jersey.

His grandfather, William Estill, was a soldier in the war of 1812, in Captain Gooden's Company, Kentucky Militia, and drew a pension under law of 1871, certificate No. 9346.

His uncle, Isaac Estill, was a soldier in the Mexican war, Company F, Fourth United States Infantry, also lieutenant, Company F, Twenty-eighth Illinois Volunteers. Was wounded in battle of Hatchie, Tenn., and died at Bolivar, Tenn., in December, 1862.

His uncle, David F. Estill, was a soldier in Company K, One hundred and fourteenth Illinois Volunteers, and died in the service at Camp Sherman, Miss., in 1863.

His uncle, Samuel Estill, was captain Company K, One hundred and fourteenth Illinois Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion.

His father, William J. Estill, was a soldier in both the Mexican war and the war of the rebellion, as above shown.

The above facts appear from the petition of claimant, and the affidavits of Hon. T. W. McNeely, a member of this House from 1869 to 1875, and P. S. Scott, both of whom have lived at Petersburg for periods of fifty and thirty-eight years, respectively, and who have personal knowledge of the facts.

Petitioner has no pensionable status. He was over 16 years of age at the time of his father's death.

On the above facts the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment in order to perfect this bill. It is hardly in shape as it reads now, and the amendment would be virtually a substitute for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to place upon the pension roll, subject otherwise to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William C. Estill, permanently helpless son of William J. Estill, late private in Company A, Sixteenth United States Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $12 per month."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that ought to be laid upon the table. There is no justification whatever for its passage.

The report gives the genealogy of the applicant. It appears that his great-grandfather was a soldier, his grandfather was a soldier, his uncle and another uncle, and still another were soldiers; his father, too, and possibly his cousins, his sisters, and his aunts, were nurses in the war. But that is the only reason assigned for pensioning him. He never was in the Army, never was in the war; he is only 34 years old——

Mr. MEREDITH. He was not born when the war was going on.

Mr. ERDMAN. He lost his arms by an explosion of a cannon, firing a celebration——

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman say that the records show that this man never was a soldier?

Mr. ERDMAN. Why, he is only 34 years old now.

Mr. MEREDITH. Of course he could hardly have been in the Army at that early age.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have come across an article in the Forum of May, 1893, on the "Anomalies of our private pension system," that I think would be of benefit, if the House would hear it read. If the House, however, prefers to have it in the RECORD, I shall not object; otherwise I will read it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be permitted to print the article in connection with his remarks.

There was no objection.

The article in question is as follows:

[The Forum, May, 1893.]

ANOMALIES OF OUR PRIVATE PENSION SYSTEM.

There are two distinct methods of granting pensions in the United States. Through the medium of the Pension Bureau, by virtue of a complex system of general laws, the growth of a century, the adjudication of pension claims goes forward ceaselessly, and at the present time 2,000 employees of that Bureau dispose of about 1,000 original and increase claims a day. Congress has equipped this great machine and, aside from annual supplies of fuel, gives it only occasional attention.

To this great mill, grinding not slowly, nor, indeed, exceeding fine, the granting of pensions by special act of Congress bears only remote relation. To secure a special act, the person who for any reason whatsoever surmises that he may be able to obtain a benefit not afforded by the general laws seeks to secure the introduction by a member of Congress of a private bill for his relief. The basis of his application may be the fact that his claim has been rejected by the Pension Bureau, or that for some technical rather than material reason he can not secure a pension under the general laws. It may be that he already receives a pension at a rate less than he conceives desirable or that, because of conspicuous services, he aspires to an extraordinary rate. Be the pretext what it may, such bill is referred to a committee, by whom it is considered and reported to the House or Senate, favorably or adversely, or permitted to expire with the Congress. If reported favorably, passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate, and signed by the President, such bill becomes a law, and the party named therein, and he alone, is benefited thereby.

Formerly the initial step was not usually, as now, the introduction of a bill setting forth the action proposed, but the presentation of a petition for relief, which was referred to a committee for consideration. If their decision was favorable, a bill suited to the case was reported by the committee; if adverse, a resolution was submitted suggesting that "the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition," a privilege by no means so valuable in effect as benignant in expression.

The early reports of the Committees on Pensions show that the stalwart statesmen of the past were called upon to deal with the same perplexing and sometimes trivial problems as are their successors of the present. In April, 1818, the Senate Committee on Pensions reported on a petition setting forth that the petitioner "in June last, while firing a salute in honor of the President of the United States, who was passing in a steamboat," lost both his arms, and therefore asked to be pensioned. The committee, however, "resolved that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted." In January, 1820, the Senate committee stated that "the pension list already amounts to between three and four millions of dollars, and the committee can not believe it expedient at this time to open the doors to a new and very numerous class of applicants" (referring to those persons who had not served the requisite nine months in the military establishment), and that they found it "impossible to extend pecuniary reward to all who deserve well of their country." The same committee recommended that a petitioner who, while serving under General St. Clair in 1791, had been "wounded slightly in the little finger," should have "leave to withdraw his petition."

Many so-called petitions for pension are still received by each Congress, but they are not usually in such form as to receive or merit careful consideration. A statement signed by admiring neighbors, setting forth the personal virtues of the applicant, does not raise any presumption that he is entitled to a pension. On the other hand, the indiscriminate introduction of private bills, which, however little the member may intend it, bear his constructive indorsement and implied certificate that in his opinion each represents a meritorious claim, is an unmixed evil.

It is not to be supposed that these bills are all introduced by members of Congress with a full knowledge of the facts or an expectation that they will become laws. On the contrary, it is unfortunately the exception when a member has any definite knowledge of the circumstances of the case which he, in a measure, makes his own by the introduction of the bill. It is easier to hand such a bill to the Clerk when requested than to investigate the merits of the matter; and thus the records of Congress are needlessly cumbered, the files are inordinately burdened, the labors of committees are enormously augmented, and many deserving cases are crowded to the rear by less worthy but more aggressive claimants. Not only do members present bills without deliberation or investigation, but they have fallen into a custom of culling out early in each Congress all the bills introduced by themselves in the previous Congress which failed of passage, and of again introducing them as a matter of course, without inquiry as to whether the conditions remain such as to justify it.

This custom has resulted in the introduction in one day by one member of as many as seventy private pension bills. In the Fifty-second Congress an energetic Western member introduced a bill to pension a widow, and zealously sought a favorable report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who on investigation found that precisely the same bill, introduced by the same member, had passed the Fifty-first Congress, and that the beneficiary thereof had been in comfortable receipt of her pension for more than a year. In 1892 a very prominent Southern member introduced a bill to restore pension to a soldier's widow. Inquiry developed the fact that an exact duplicate of this bill had become a law in February, 1891, and that the intervening year had been spent by the Pension Bureau in a fruitless endeavor to ascertain her post-office address, in order that the pension might be paid to her. The member, being made acquainted with these facts and asked for information as to the whereabouts of the beneficiary, blushingly admitted that he did not know her and had no recollection of the matter; and this is why the pension granted by the Fifty-first Congress to Sarah A. Phelps still awaits a claimant!

The remedy for this evil lies in a change of rules, already in contemplation by members of the Fifty-third Congress, so as to prohibit the introduction of private pension bills and the needless printing and expense attending them, and requiring that all such claims be presented by petition only, which petition shall be referred to the proper committee for consideration. This petition should be not a numerously signed, indefinite, and irrelevant statement, but the sworn affidavit of the petitioner, setting forth specifically the grounds on which the claim to relief is based, and supported by the properly executed testimony of disinterested parties. If the facts presented in any case warrant favorable action, the committee should then report a bill in proper form and clearly worded, calculated to afford an adequate relief and not liable to misconstruction by the Pension Bureau.

The number of private pension bills introduced in recent Congresses is truly enormous. In the Fifty-first Congress the total number was 6,499, the Senate furnishing 1,545 and the House 4,954. Of the bills originating in the House 4,098 were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which has jurisdiction of all matters relating to pensions growing out of the late war, and 856 to the Committee on Pensions, having jurisdiction of bills relating to the Revolutionary war, the war of 1812, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and to service in the Regular Army or Navy prior to or subsequent to the war of the rebellion. Of these six and a half thousand bills exactly fourteen hundred were enacted into laws. The methods of recent Congresses in dealing with these great numbers of private pension bills will appear from a brief table prepared from the dockets of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions. This table shows that in the Forty-eighth Congress (1883-1885) 2,783 bills were received, 555 were favorably and 448 adversely reported, and 1,780 were not acted on. In the Forty-ninth Congress (1885-1887) the proportions were 4,357, 768, 610, and 2,979; in the Fiftieth Congress (1887-1889), 4,295, 1,134, 263, and 2,898; in the Fifty-first Congress (1889-1891), 4,098, 853, 96, and 3,149. In the Fifty-second Congress (1891-1893) 2,100 bills were received; 227 were favorably and 30 adversely reported. Of that Congress it can not be said, as of those preceding, that the bills not reported were not acted on, for the reason that this committee in the Fifty-second Congress made an effort to give some consideration to all the private bills coming before them, and they have left a docket record of the merits or demerits of fully 90 per cent of the 2,100 received.

These figures show a very striking and increasing disinclination to take the responsibility of making adverse reports; but it should be borne in mind that while only 96 adverse reports were made in the Fifty-first Congress, the passage of 3,149 bills was quite as effectually prevented by refusing or failing to report them as if they had been reported adversely, and the same is proportionately true of the action of other Congresses.

It is obvious that in these five Congresses it was a physical impossibility to consider fully all these bills and that the time consumed in their consideration must have resulted in detriment to interests of a public and general character, and, furthermore, that the consideration given to such bills as were reported could not possibly have been so thorough as to import such infallibility in the conclusions as to justify the President's signature without examination.

The object of the special-act pension is, in theory at least, to give relief in such exceptional and meritorious cases as, for some good reason, technical or perhaps unique, the general laws do not include in their beneficent scope. That this is the theory of special acts is clearly indicated by a joint resolution of Congress approved May 29, 1830, as follows:

"Resolved, That the heads of departments who may severally be charged with the administration of the pension laws of the United States of America be, and they hereby are, respectively directed and required, as soon as may be after the opening of each session of Congress, to present to the Senate and House of Representatives a several list of such persons, whether Revolutionary, invalid, or otherwise, as shall have made application for pension or an increase of pension, and as, in their opinion, ought to be placed on the pension roll or otherwise provided for, and for doing which they have not sufficient power or authority, with the names and residences of such persons, the capacity in which they served, the degree of relief proposed, and a brief statement of the grounds thereof, to the end that Congress may consider the same."

To assume, however, that this resolution, which is still in force, gave rise to the custom of granting pensions by special act would be as erroneous as to suppose that it is responsible for the numerous private acts which have emanated from recent Congresses. That such is not the case is shown by the fact that while nearly 4,000 private pension bills were introduced in the Fifty-second Congress, only two cases were received from the Secretary of the Interior, in pursuance of the resolution quoted, recommending that relief be granted by special act, while two others were received suggesting the repeal of former special acts on the ground that they were secured by fraud.

The private pension act is coexistent with our constitutional Government. The First Congress enacted 22 such measures, of which the very first, the prototype of nearly 7,000 which have followed, was enacted June 4, 1790, granting an annuity of $2,500 during life, commencing January 1, 1790, "in order to make full and adequate compensation to Frederick William de Steuben for the sacrifices and eminent services made and rendered to the United States during the late war." It will be remembered that Baron Steuben had come to America in 1777 and volunteered his services without stipulation as to reward, and had served as inspector-general of the Army with rank of major-general, introducing and perfecting the discipline of the Army; and his services were so conspicuous and their value was so much appreciated that as early as April, 1784, a resolution to pay him the sum of $45,000 was considered in the Continental Congress, but defeated, as were sundry subsequent propositions of a similar nature.

In this First Congress there were also allowed to Sarah, widow of Major-General Earl-of-Sterling, who had died in the service of the United States, a sum equal to the half pay of a major-general for seven years, and to Frances E., daughter of Lieut. Col. John Laurens, a sum equal to seven years' half pay of a lieutenant-colonel. This latter action had been recommended by a resolution of the Continental Congress as early as March 1, 1785. In the private pensions allowed by the First Congress the prevailing rate a month was $5, with some as low as $2, these corresponding to the rates in vogue under the Continental Congress. Three reasons for the very early ingrafting of this feature of private-pension acts upon our legislative system are here suggested:

First. The exceptional occasion growing out of the then recent war of the Revolution for acknowledging and rewarding the distinguished and often gratuitous services of citizens, and more especially of titled foreigners who had fought in the American armies.

Second. The absence of any adequate system of general pension laws.

Third. The very moderate rates of pension which had been granted under the provisions adopted by the late Congress. The Continental Congress made provision on August 26, 1776, for half-pay pensions for life to soldiers and sailors for loss of limbs and other disabilities. In August, 1780, provision was made for the payment for seven years of half-pay pensions to the widows and minor children of such officers as had died or should thereafter die in the military service of the United States, and in April, 1782, it was resolved that sick and wounded soldiers should be discharged and should receive a pension of $5 a month in lieu of all pay and emoluments.

These provisions had not, of course, the force of statute law, as the body that was responsible for them had no means of raising revenue or of enforcing its resolutions; but the first Congress under the Constitution hastened to assume responsibility for the payment by the United States from March 4, 1789, of such pensions as had been formerly granted and paid by the several States in pursuance of acts of the late Congress. But it was not until March 23, 1792, that general pension legislation of any considerable scope was enacted, and this provided that the applicant for pension should present his evidence to the circuit court of the district where he resided, which court should determine the rate of pension to be allowed, and should certify the case to the Secretary of War, who should place the name on the pension roll. In less than one year (on February 28, 1793) a large portion of this act was repealed on the ground that it had been "found by experience inadequate to prevent the admission of improper claims to invalid pensions," and provision was then made for taking evidence in invalid claims by the judge of the district, or by three persons commissioned for that purpose by the judge, and for the examination of the applicant by two physicians appointed by the judge; for the transmission of the claims and evidence to the Secretary of War, to be compared with the records of his office, and then reported to Congress for such action as might seem proper.

From this date, it is interesting to note, the Secretary of War was vested with no authority to place any name on the pension roll without first submitting each particular case to Congress for its action, and this prevailed until the last day of the Fifteenth Congress, when the Secretary of War was empowered to place on the rolls, without reporting the same to Congress, the names of such persons as were found entitled under existing laws. During this interval of twenty-six years, from 1793 to 1819, all pensions granted were allowed by what was, in form, a special act of Congress, each pensioner being mentioned by name and his rate being fixed by the act. As the reasons heretofore cited account for the introduction of the "special act," so do these twenty-six years of personal and individual legislation account for its thorough intrenchment in our legislative system.*

The more important general pension laws were enacted in 1793, 1806, 1813, 1818, 1832, 1838, 1862, 1871, 1887, and 1890. A comparison of these dates with the table of special acts discloses no possible relation of cause and effect. It is to be expected, perhaps, that the number of special acts should increase rather than decrease with increasing population and increasing numbers of beneficiaries under the general laws, for many a person is prompted to seek a pension or increase of pension either under the general laws or by special act, less by a positive sense of legal title and desert or of injustice suffered than by a comparison of his own status with that of some one who is in receipt of something which he has not. The prevailing formula in applications for increase is that the "rate is not proportionate to that received by other persons for similar disabilities," and it is probable that there would be more contentment among the pensioners if a uniform, even though small, rate of pension were allowed to all than with the present innumerable recognized rates, varying from $1 to $100 a month.

Herein lies the chief argument against the allowance of pension or increase of pension by special act, as well as the reason for the enormously increasing demand for that species of benefaction. The special act is, of necessity, personal, discriminating, and partial, and as such provokes a feeling of resentment in the minds of those who, equally deserving, have not the acquaintance, the influence, or the knowledge of "ways and means" requisite to secure similar benefits. Probably the most meritorious cases have not received the promptest attention in the private legislation of the past; and as merit is proverbially modest, the most deserving perhaps never come to the attention of Congress at all, and hence the feeling which is unquestionably growing among the soldiers and worthy beneficiaries of the general pension laws especially, that every increase of pension allowed by special act of Congress is a mark of personal favoritism and an unjust discrimination against every pensioner who is not so fortunate as to have his cause espoused by some influential man.

One interesting fact appears from the table given in the footnote, namely, that during the late war, and to some extent during the war of 1812, the granting of special pensions was noticeably reduced. From 1811 to 1815, covering the period of the war of 1812, there were only 3 special acts; from 1861 to 1863, only 15, and from 1863 to 1865, only 29, to be followed at once by 139 and 292. During these great crises the attention of Congress was necessarily centered on matters of public interest to the exclusion of those personal and private. Can it be that private legislation is a form of mischief found for idle hands to do?

An extreme position on any disputed question is likely to prove untenable, and here it must be admitted that there is a legitimate, but limited, field for the allowance of pension by special act. The statement that all rules have their exceptions is true, though trite, and it is obvious that no general law could be framed which would invariably give relief to the deserving and exclude the unworthy. Recognizing this fact, after an experience of nearly forty years, Congress passed the joint resolution of May 29, 1830, already quoted, in order that the worthy persons excluded might, in a systematic manner, be brought to the attention of Congress, rather than that the claimant's whim or failure of satiety should transfer the adjudication of his claim for pension from the proper bureau to a most inadequate tribunal. That the proper field of the special act is a limited one may well be assumed from the fact that the first twenty Congresses, legislating for those who had borne the hardships of two great wars, enacted only 107, an average of 5 for each Congress. The next twenty Congresses show an average of 80. For the next ten Congresses the average is 489. What is the cause of this enormous increase? Is it that the general laws for this period were mean and niggardly or strict and technical, so that few could get their deserts through the regular channels and many were thus forced to appeal to Congress? Let the 489,725 pensioners on the rolls on June 20, 1889, following the adjournment of the Fiftieth Congress, answer. And what shall we say of the 1,400 bills passed by the Fifty-first Congress, about three times the average of the ten preceding Congresses, and that, too, in face of the fact that before its legislative days had half expired the act of June 27, 1890, had become a law, extending to hundreds of thousands by general enactment new or additional benefits?

Were the provisions of the general laws from June 27, 1890, to the close of the Fifty-first Congress so circumscribed that worthy claimants by the thousand were forced to seek relief through other channels? Let the 676,160 pensioners on the rolls on June 30, 1891, together with the 876,068 names on the rolls on June 30, 1892, and the $165,000,000 appropriated by the last Congress for the ensuing year be the answer.

Existing laws are so ample that one may well wonder what kinds of pension claims are presented in these private bills; what meritorious service done or what peculiar hardships undergone the claimants urge to justify the benefits invoked. Of 2,100 bills before the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Fifty-second Congress, 332 asked for increase of pension to soldiers already pensioned; 330 were to pension civilian employees and others not regularly mustered into the military service of the United States; 146 contained no sufficient data to identify the claims in the Pension Bureau; 131 sought to interfere with claims not yet adjudicated by the Pension Bureau; 117 were erroneously referred to that committee; 110 were to grant pensions to soldiers' mothers not pensionable under the general laws; 104 to grant pensions to women who had by remarriage forfeited the pension once granted them as widows; 102 to increase the pension of widows already pensioned. Besides these, there were bills for army nurses, stepmothers, stepfathers, foster mothers, children over 16 years of age, soldiers who had deserted, women not legally married to soldiers, women who had been divorced from their soldier husbands, soldiers who had served less than ninety days, and soldiers not disabled from any cause.

In two instances where a bill was introduced to pension the supposed widow of a soldier who had long since disappeared and long been mourned as dead, it was discovered that the elusive consort was still living and had applied for pension, and his post-office address was accordingly furnished to his erstwhile disconsolate widow!

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, it is because of the facts which have been stated that I asked permission to postpone the consideration of that bill on the Calendar and take up a bill for one who had been actually in service, but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HICKS] objected.

Mr. STEELE. As we had a perfect right to do.

Mr. CONNOLLY. As you had a perfect right to do. You have always a right to be discourteous.

Mr. STEELE. And some people always seem to have a right to grumble without cause.

Mr. MEREDITH. I want the House to understand what they are doing in legislation of this character. It does seem to me, and I speak seriously, that the House can not understand the position in which we are placing ourselves by undertaking to adopt such a measure as this.

I am not here to oppose pension legislation; I am not here to oppose the granting of a pension to any man who was injured in the service of his country; but we have just passed a bill to increase the pension of a man who was hurt twenty years and more after the war, and almost the very next bill that comes up is to grant a pension to a man who was not born until after the war was over, and upon no other ground in the world, as shown by the report, than the fact that his ancestors had been soldiers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if these are just and sufficient grounds upon which to give a man a pension, there is not a man in the House who is not entitled to a pension; and it is an absurdity to my mind, when we are the custodians of the people's money, and represent the Government, that we should, upon such frivolous pretexts, pay out that money to special beneficiaries or to any man simply and solely because his grandfather or his great-grandfather or his uncles had been soldiers in the Revolutionary war or the war of 1812. It is an absurdity, I repeat; and I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact, and let it go to the country, that we are coming here on Friday nights to pass bills of this character—bills which are an outrage upon the people.

There are bills, I have no doubt, on the Calendar that are strictly meritorious and which present an equitable right to a pension—bills for the relief of people who saw service, and were injured in the service of the country, and I have never raised my hand or my voice against one of them. But, Mr. Chairman, when we come to pension people who were not born until after the late unpleasantness, who have no claim upon the Government except the fact that their ancestors were soldiers in the war of the Revolution and in the war of 1812, it seems to me every right-thinking man in this House will come to the conclusion that we should call a halt on bills of that kind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, it does not matter a particle whether this bill is passed or not. I merely desire to call the attention of this House to this class of bills, and it seems to me that they ought to meet with the condemnation of this body.

Mr. HULICK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what kind of a celebration it was that this man was attending when he met with this accident?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, a Democratic celebration over a Democratic victory.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that this bill does not come within the rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state the point of order?

Mr. SPALDING. That it does not come within the rule for Friday night sessions, granting pensions to soldiers or removing charges of desertion. This man was not a soldier, and consequently this bill can not come up at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I introduced this bill for a constituent of mine who is a party friend of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH]——

Mr. MEREDITH. That does not change the principle at all.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I want to say that while he insists there is no ground at all for the passage of pension bills of this kind, I have a recollection that not many days ago the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] voted for a pension to a daughter of a Revolutionary soldier. She had never been in the Army.

Mr. ELLIS. And was born long after the war.

Mr. CONNOLLY. She was born long after the Revolutionary war closed, but she lived in Virginia, and therefore I presume she ought to be a pensioner. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, if this man's father had died one day before the boy was 16 years of age, he would have been entitled to a pension of $12 a month, but he did not die at that time. The lead that was fired into his body, which kept him an invalid for years, enabled him to draw a pension out of which he maintained this helpless crippled son for twenty years. That father finally succumbed to the lead that was fired into him, but, unfortunately for the boy, the latter had passed his sixteenth birthday, and hence, under our general pension law, the father lived a little too long to enable the son to draw a pension.

Now, I protest that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], who is ready to vote for pensions for the sons and daughters of Revolutionary soldiers, if they live in Virginia, although those sons and daughters were born long after the Revolutionary war, ought not to come here now and attempt to throw contempt on a son of the war of the rebellion, because, forsooth, his father died a little too late to enable the boy to come and get a pension under the general law. His father was a soldier, and a good one. He served both in the war of the rebellion and in the war with Mexico. His grandfather fought in all the wars which the country had during the time he was on earth, and his great-grandfather did, too; but this boy, who was maintained by his father for years out of the little pension that he drew, upon the death of the father became a charge upon kinsmen who were as poor as he, and unable to maintain him at all. It is for reasons of this kind that I introduced this bill here, believing that he had as good a right to be maintained now for the remaining years of his crippled life as the grandson or granddaughter of a Revolutionary soldier should now be maintained by the Government. Hence, I protest against the attempt to sneer this case out of court on the part of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], because, forsooth, this man does not live in the State that once was the mother of Presidents, but which ceased bearing long ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, the little fling which the gentleman makes at old Virginia needs no reply from me. I would say to him that the people of Virginia appreciate and honor her Presidents of the past; but we appreciate another fact, Mr. Chairman. The time has not yet come when Virginians can again hold that position—although she has many sons who would worthily fill that exalted station—because the very unpleasantness to which my friend has alluded has caused party lines to be so strictly drawn that it would be impossible for any man who deserves the name of man and who lives in that grand old State to obtain sufficient votes to elect him to that high office until the feeling to which my friend has alluded is dispelled by time.

My friend says that I have attempted to sneer this case out of court. He is mistaken. It is a matter of supreme indifference to me whether this House grants this pension or not. It is a case which perhaps ought to appeal to the sympathies of this House as it appeals to mine. But, sir, we stand here as Representatives, to do justice to the Government as well as to the unfortunate citizens of the country. In reference to the statement made by my friend that I voted recently to pension the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier, I want to say to him that I may have done so, although I have no recollection of the case; but if I did, I followed a precedent which has been established in the past; and if the gentleman will turn to the statutes he will find that a goodly number of the daughters of the Revolution have been pensioned. If there was one such beneficiary from Virginia who received my vote in the present Congress, although I have now no knowledge of the case, I was simply following a precedent which had been already set, and I am sure that my friend has just such cases in his own State.

If there is any cause why this young man should be pensioned, I say we have a right to pension thousands and tens of thousands of people who have been unfortunate, whose ancestors were in the Revolutionary war or the war of 1812. It is not a question of sentiment, but a question which addresses itself to the sound discretion of this House and of the country that by our votes we are to say whether we are to be controlled by sympathy and by the eloquence of the gentlemen, or whether we are to be guided by what seems to be honest and just to the Government and to the people, as well as by the rules of common sense. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about this, and only one. This is the establishment of a principle that I do not believe has ever been practiced in the pension legislation of this nation. We have pensioned the imbecile children of soldiers of the late war; but this is not an imbecile. This is a child that lost his arms years after the war. He is now only 34 years of age, and if this is to be used as a precedent, there will be no end of this matter of pensioning. I heartily concur in the opinion of the distinguished gentlemen here that this whole business of pensioning the granddaughters of soldiers of the Revolution is infamous and bad.

There is no principle of pensioning upon which it can be based. I stand here now to say to this House that I am ready to vote at any time to repeal every bill of this kind. [Applause.] It is wrong in principle, and if it is to be followed up, the time will soon come when the pension rolls of this nation will be so enormous that the people will rise up and destroy it and do great wrong to meritorious pensioners. And so, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make any motion in this case. I very much dislike to antagonize this measure, coming from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], whom I respect so much; but this is wrong in principle, and the bill ought to be beaten.

Mr. AVERY. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. AVERY. Upon what theory does the law pension the imbecile child of a soldier?

Mr. BLUE. The theory, as I understand it, is this: That the imbecile child is not able to support itself.

Mr. AVERY. That is very true. Is not the same theory true of the infirm child, absolutely incapable?

Mr. BLUE. That may be so. But, if the gentleman will permit, if this is to be established and followed as a rule, every time the child of a soldier of the late war loses his arm, or loses a hand, or is seriously maimed, in principle it follows on the same line that this House would be bound by its action to give him a pension. And I am not ready to open the door that wide, and shall vote against this bill.

Mr. AVERY. You would confine it to the imbecile, and not give relief to the helpless.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make any speech about this pension. I can not speak like the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] or the distinguished gentleman from Illinois; but I want to call the attention of the committee to some of the reasons why this claimant should be entitled to a pension, and see if they are based upon justice, right, and principle. I think certainly that must be a joke attempted to be played upon the Committee of the Whole to-night. Certainly the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], with his open, honest face can not be in earnest in his advocacy of this claim. He is certainly not looking at it in the proper light, if he is in earnest in the advocacy of this claim. If so, I must say he certainly is laboring under a tremendous optical delusion, if he looks at it seriously. Now, what are some of the reasons why you are asked by the committee here to grant this claim? In the first place the report says:

> By reason of a premature discharge of a cannon at Petersburg, Ill., * * * he lost both arms at elbow.

Has this Government anything in the world to do with that? Was not that after the war was over? Was he in the service of the United States? Another reason is:

> His father, William J. Estill, was a private in Company A, Sixteenth United States Infantry, in the Mexican war.

Possibly you can find a number of others who had just as distinguished fathers as this gentleman had. So that seems to me to be no reason for pensioning this man. The report goes on to say that his great-grandfather, William F. Estill, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war from the State of New Jersey. Well, what of that? That has nothing in the world to do with the question of this committee recommending this claim. It is totally irrelevant. It does not touch the question at all, and it is no reason whatever why this man should receive a pension. There is no sense in it, there is no decency in it, there is no justice in it, there is no principle in it.

Another reason assigned is that his uncle was a soldier in the Mexican war and another uncle was a soldier in another war! I am astonished that the committee has not gone on to speak of his aunts and his cousins—his first and second and third cousins—has not told us where they are all "at," and brought them in as extra and additional reasons why this man should receive a pension at the hands of the United States Government. [Laughter.] I am astonished, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, composed as it is of able and distinguished men, should bring such a claim in here, and I am glad that the name of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAYTON] is not attached to this report, and I can not believe that he is going to vote for this bill. [Laughter.]

Here is what the committee say after what I have already quoted: "Petitioner has no pensionable status whatever." That amounts to saying that he is not entitled to a pension under any conditions or under any circumstances. That is what this committee themselves say, and yet they recommend that this man be given a pension!

Again, they say that he was over 16 years of age at the time of his father's death, thus putting him in another aspect entirely outside the pale of the law, which provides that no child over the age of 16 shall be pensioned unless an imbecile or an idiot. This man is not an imbecile; this man is not an idiot. He is disabled, it is true, and all such pitiful objects have my sympathy. They ought to be dealt with and cared for—ought to be put into some poor-house and taken proper care of—but it is not right or proper that the Government of the United States should be asked to provide for them.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the pitiful little sum that would be given in this case that I am opposing; it is the principle—the precedent that you would establish, by which you would open the flood gates so that thousands of others just as needy and just as deserving would be coming here and asking pensions upon the same plea. I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that this committee will seriously consider this case. I hope the claim will not be granted. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on this bill. I trust that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] will not insist upon its passage. I dislike to take up the time of the committee, but I really think that if we pass this bill, we take a step that we shall regret hereafter.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I am glad to see the House think of making a halt somewhere, even if I have to suffer by it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HICKS. This man has no pensionable status.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No; if he had, he would not be here asking a pension by special bill.

Mr. HICKS. I can pick out a large number of worthy persons in my district, children of honorably discharged soldiers, who are crippled for life by reason of disabilities or accidents incurred since the war, and if we pass this bill, I really think we shall take a step in the wrong direction, which will excite the attention of the country and invite disapproval. I believe in a pension for every honorably discharged soldier, and for the widow of every such soldier who is unable to earn a livelihood.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Or for the imbecile child of a soldier?

Mr. HICKS. Or for the imbecile child of a soldier.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Or for the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier?

Mr. HICKS. Or for the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Or for a soldier of the war of 1812? [Laughter.]

Mr. HICKS. I will even agree with my friend on that proposition, but when we undertake to pension the child of a soldier for a disability resulting from some infirmity contracted since the war, or from some accident, we are certainly setting a precedent that will come to plague us in the future. It is a new departure, as has just been remarked by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. CONNOLLY. Does not the gentleman know that we have passed a half dozen bills of this kind in this very Congress?

Mr. HICKS. If we have I do not remember them. I certainly would not have voted for them had I known their character, and I trust that this bill will be voted down. If we passed the bills, as stated by the gentleman, the principle suggested in this bill is wrong, and we can not afford to establish a precedent such as is proposed by the pending measure.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TALBERT that the bill be laid on the table, the Chairman declared the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 23.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid on the table.

GEORGE F. MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2153) to amend the military record of George F. Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the record of George F. Miller, who enlisted under the name of George F. Young on the 10th day of May, 1861, in Company G, Seventy-first Regiment New York Volunteers, and that an honorable discharge be granted.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. TYLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2153) to amend the military record of George F. Miller, after careful consideration, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

It appears from the records of the War Department that this soldier, under the name of George F. Young, jr., enlisted at the age of 14, on the 9th day of May, 1861, as a private in Company G, Second Regiment Excelsior Brigade, subsequently designated Company G, Seventy-first New York Infantry Volunteers, and was mustered into service June 28, 1861, to serve three years. It appeared that he served faithfully until March 18, 1862, when he is reported deserted. From the evidence of comrades corroborating the statement under oath of the applicant it further appears that the said George F. Miller, while stationed with his regiment at Sandy Point, Maryland, in March, 1862, was placed on the sick list because of an injury or sprain to his ankle received while at drill in the line of duty, and so remained until May 2, 1862, when his regiment was ordered to the peninsula of Virginia. The said Miller was then sent home as unfit for duty, where he remained until the close of the war.

The soldier further states that his furlough and discharge were to follow on his return home, but this was never done. The testimony further shows that Miller was never fit for duty again at any time prior to the expiration of his term of enlistment; that, indeed, he has always been a sufferer more or less from the injury received and is still at times forced to use a crutch or cane.

The committee believe that there is nothing in this soldier's record to show that he intended to desert, but that he was prevented from completing his term of enlistment by reason of disability contracted in the service. The extreme youth of the soldier alone, being a mere child of 14 years when he entered the military service, ought of itself to relieve him of the stigma resting on his name. His present reputation as a citizen is excellent.

The committee, in view of all the facts of this case, recommend the passage of the bill for his relief with this amendment:

Line 8, after the word "granted," insert "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall become payable by reason of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

NATHAN MITCHELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5612) granting a pension to Nathan Mitchell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension roll the name of Nathan Mitchell, a soldier in the Mexican war, at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. HARDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5612) entitled "A bill granting a pension to Nathan Mitchell," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment.

The claimant's statement as to his service is as follows:

In the spring of 1846 he accompanied General Taylor's army from Corpus Christi, Tex., to the Rio Grande, in the capacity of forage master, under Major McRea, United States quartermaster, and that soon after this he was appointed as secretary and interpreter (he being conversant with the Spanish language) to Colonel Cross, of the Quartermaster's Department, and served with him until the Colonel was assassinated by the Mexicans. About that time he was mustered into the service as a private in Capt. Sam H. Walker's company of scouts, specially ordered into service by General Taylor, and he served as a member of said company until it was merged into Hays's regiment Texas Mounted Volunteers.

When the army left the fort on the Rio Grande he was specially ordered by General Taylor to remain as interpreter to Major Brown, the commander of the fort. On May 1, 1846, the enemy began a bombardment of the fort, and Major Brown at once ordered every man unattached to the army then in the fort to organize into a company and assist in the defense of the garrison. Of this company the claimant was elected captain, and with it participated under arms in the defense of Fort Brown (so named in honor of the gallant commander, who was killed during the engagement) during the eight days' bombardment which followed.

The claimant further states that upon the relief of the garrison by General Taylor the company disbanded and the members thereof returned to their former duties.

Mr. Mitchell made application for a pension under the Mexican war service pension act of January 29, 1887, but the same was rejected because of the inability of the War Department to find a record of the service as a soldier, although the Pension Bureau had, in 1857, issued a land warrant to the claimant upon his furnishing incontestible proof of his service as above set forth.

Among the papers on file is a letter of F. V. Britton, late an officer in the United States Army, dated Rancho near Corpus Christi, Tex., January 7, 1859, in which he certifies that Mr. Mitchell was reported to him (Britton) at Fort Brown as having been placed in command of all unattached teamsters, convalescents, etc., for service in the defense of the fort, and that he (Mitchell) served faithfully in battle as well as in every other situation his duties to the Government placed him.

Gen. D. E. Twiggs, late of the Army, also certifies, under date of December 18, 1858, to the fact of claimant's participation in the defense of Fort Brown. There is other evidence of the service, including the following certificate:

"The undersigned, formerly an assistant surgeon, United States Army, and veteran of the Mexican war, certifies that he served with the garrison in defense of Fort Brown in 1846, and was personally well acquainted with Mr. Nathan Mitchell, who remained with the garrison when the army under General Taylor marched to Point Isabel. Mr. Mitchell was given by Major Brown the command of a squad of civilians, employees of various departments of the Army, and unquestionably rendered as brave and efficient service in the defense of the fort as any of the other members of the garrison, for which reason I do not hesitate to declare that he has as clear a right to receive a Mexican war pension as any of the veterans who are now enjoying one.

"GRAYSON M. PREVOST.

"FACABECAS, March 4, 1896."

The testimony shows that Mr. Mitchell is now 78 years old and totally blind. He has some interest in Texas lands, but nothing that produces an income, and he stands in need of the relief provided by the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. JULIA JONES DUNCAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1975) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Jones Duncan, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Samuel A. Duncan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Mrs. Julia Jones Duncan, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Samuel A. Duncan, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WESLEY A. PLETCHER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5183) granting an increase of pension to Wesley A. Pletcher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Wesley A. Pletcher, late of Company K, One hundred and sixty-first Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, a pension of $30 per month from the passage of this bill, in lieu of the pension now drawn by him of $8 per month under certificate 502227.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us hear the report.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5183) granting an increase of pension to Wesley A. Pletcher, having carefully examined and fully considered all the facts presented in this case, respectfully report as follows:

Wesley A. Pletcher enlisted May 2, 1864, as private in Company K, One hundred and sixty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was honorably discharged September 2, 1864. He filed claim for pension February 24, 1880, alleging that at Martinsburg, W. Va., July 15, 1864, he was attacked with sunstroke which resulted in heart disease and asthma. The claim was rejected July 24, 1885, on the ground of no record of any disability in service and no evidence of origin in service. He filed claim under act of June 27, 1890, on July 28, 1890, for sunstroke, asthma, heart disease, and paralysis of right arm. Claim was admitted March 26, 1891, at $12 per month for "paralysis and disease of heart."

The claimant furnished testimony of soundness at enlistment, and the testimony of Michael D. Pletcher, his half-brother, who was a comrade, and who testifies to being an eyewitness to claimant receiving sunstroke while working in the trenches near Martinsburg, W. Va., on or about June 11, 1864, and that he fell down in the ditch, and affiant and others lifted him out and took him to a shade tree; that after a while he got better and went to quarters; that affiant lived on same farm with him up to 1876, and knows that he suffered from pain in his head and pain in his heart, and when walking had sick spells and was short of breath, and from discharge to 1876 was fully three-fourths disabled for manual labor.

Claimant says Dr. Kennedy, who treated him from discharge to 1878, is dead, and that Dr. Raines, who treated him up to 1884, then went to California, and he is unable to secure the medical testimony required, or that of other comrades or officers.

Claimant is wholly disabled for performing any kind of manual labor. The board of surgeons at Fowler, Ind., February 13, 1891, rated him eighteen-eighteenths for paralysis, eighteen-eighteenths for enlarged heart, and one eighteenth for asthma. They report paralysis of both sides, most marked in arms and vocal organs; applicant unable to talk, except a few words, so as to be understood, and is unable to use his hands to help himself; heart enlarged, area of dullness increased 1½ inches, sounds irregular, and impulse weak.

In view of his deplorable condition, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out all after the word "month," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof "in lieu of the pension now drawn by him."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like some explanation in regard to this bill, either from the gentleman who introduced it or from the gentleman who reported it. The report states, "The claimant furnished testimony of soundness up to his enlistment." What kind of testimony was that? Was it sworn testimony?

Mr. HANLY. It was sworn testimony, as I understand.

Mr. TALBERT. Further on, the report says: "The claimant is wholly disabled from performing any kind of manual labor." What kind of evidence is produced to show that fact? Is it some unsworn statement of somebody, or is it sworn testimony?

Mr. HANLY. That fact was established by affidavit. I will add that I know this man myself. I know he is in a deplorable condition. I know that the facts are in truth as set forth in the report.

Mr. TALBERT. The report states: "Dr. Raines, who treated him (the applicant for pension) up to 1884, then went to California, and he is unable to secure the medical testimony required or that of other comrades or officers." There seems to be some contradiction here.

Mr. HANLY. He was unable to furnish the medical testimony.

Mr. TALBERT. But I understood the gentleman to say the testimony had been sworn to.

Mr. HANLY. The testimony as to his present condition has been sworn to; it is in the form of affidavits.

Mr. TALBERT. That is the evidence, I understand, which goes to establish that the disability was of service origin. The pension first granted to the claimant was $12 a month for paralysis and disease of the heart. But he now seeks an increase of pension; and I am anxious to know upon what kind of evidence he bases this claim. Apparently, as he states, he is unable to produce the necessary testimony. I do not think an increase of pension should be granted upon any mere informal statement. Now, if the gentleman knows of his own knowledge that this man is disabled from the performance of manual labor, I have nothing to say.

Mr. HANLY. I know of my own knowledge his exact condition, and it is established by testimony piled mountains high.

Mr. TALBERT. That is satisfactory to me.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALBERT BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7647) granting a pension of $30 per month to Albert Brown, late of Company D, One hundred and Fourteenth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Albert Brown, late of Company D, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7647) granting a pension to Albert Brown, late of Company D, One hundred and fourteenth New York Volunteers, submit the following:

Albert Brown enlisted in Company D, One hundred and fourteenth New York Volunteers, August 13, 1862, and was discharged June 17, 1865. The records and the evidence on file show that he was wounded in both thighs, the ball remaining in the right thigh; also in the hand and in the mouth, knocking out a part of his teeth, in battle while in the service. He is now pensioned at $12 per month for wound of both thighs and wound of mouth. Application for increase for same and resulting broken health was rejected February 21, 1896.

In an affidavit dated November 9, 1894, D. D. Chase, M. D., says:

"He has known claimant for twenty-five years; that in September, 1869, he examined claimant at biennial examination as examining surgeon for pensions. He was pensioned for and was suffering from gunshot wound of left and right thighs. A minie ball had passed through middle of left thigh from outside, leaving inner surface a little below middle, passing into right thigh at junction of middle and lower thirds, inner surface. The ball struck femur, lodging, and evidently gravitating subsequently into popliteal space and remaining. There was a discharging wound 2½ inches, about 1 inch outside perpendicular line to popliteal space, leading to the ball, which was firmly impacted. The open wound was discharging offensive pus.

"In September, 1871, soldier again appeared for examination. The conditions were not materially changed, except that pus was now excoriating the wound and lameness and debility of soldier aggravated. About May or June, 1872, affiant was solicited to extract the ball. By applying compressed sponges repeatedly, by August, 1872, was enabled to seize the ball, which was extracted at opening above referred to. The ball showed pieces or spiculæ of bone, and was split about one-half its diameter and presented three parts, upon which were the spiculæ of bone. Affiant kept the wound open and treated cavity with carbolized solutions, and pronounced wound healed permanently by December, 1872; but Brown did not entirely recover health, and affiant has seen him at least once each year since then and always found him in poor health, which was attributed by affiant to the disability accompanying the long continuance of ball in thigh and its resultant discharges."

The foregoing affidavit clearly shows the condition of this soldier from discharge to 1872 and at intervals ever since. He is now totally disabled for manual labor, and from the affidavit quoted and other medical and lay testimony, your committee are satisfied that such inability to labor is due to the wounds which he received in the service and their results, and therefore they recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. POOLE. In line 7, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "at the rate," and insert "and pay him a pension." Also amend the title to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Albert Brown."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. HELEN A. DE RUSSY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6159) to increase the pension of Mrs. Helen A. De Russy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Helen A. De Russy, of Washington, D. C., widow of Col. Rene E. De Russy, Corps of Engineers and brevet brigadier-general, United States Army, and pay her a pension of $100 per month, the same to be in lieu of the pension now drawn by her.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in line 9, the words "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so that it will read "50 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GROTIUS N. UDELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3605) granting a pension to Grotius N. Udell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Grotius N. Udell, late of Company B, Sixth Regiment Iowa Infantry, and pay him a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, for total inability to perform manual labor.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ANDREWS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3605) granting a pension to Grotius N. Udell, late a private in Company D, Sixth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, having carefully examined all the facts and circumstances in evidence, submit the following report:

Soldier served from July 17, 1860, until January 5, 1863. He filed claim and was pensioned from January 6, 1863, at $8 per month, for seven gunshot wounds in right shoulder, right lung and arm, and results. His pension was increased to $18 per month from April 15, 1874, and increased to $24 a month from March 3, 1883, and increased to $36 a month commencing September 7, 1892. His claim for $50 a month was rejected January 23, 1896, for failure to show a degree of disability which would entitle him to $50 a month.

The evidence shows that the injuries from which the claimant suffers were received at the battle of Shiloh April 6, 1862.

Drs. John W. Webb, A. W. Coleman, and W. A. Boyden, reputable citizens and excellent physicians of Denver, Colo., testify that claimant is totally disabled and helpless, and that he requires the constant attention of one person; and the board of examining surgeons, under date of September 7, 1892, say, after describing the wounds: "The claimant is so disabled from his three gunshot wounds and other injuries described as to be incapacitated for any manual labor. He requires the aid of another person in feeding and dressing himself. He requires frequent and periodical, though not regular and constant, aid and attendance of another person, and we recommend a rating of $50 intermediate between first and second grade."

In view of all the facts, we believe him entitled to a pension of $50 per month. We therefore recommend that the bill be amended by inserting the word "private" between the words "late" and "of," in line 6, and by striking out the words "from and after the passage of this act," in line 8, and by striking out all words after the word "receiving," in the ninth line of said bill, and as so amended that the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA CRAIG HECKMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1816) granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman, on the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MCCLELLAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1816) granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman, having carefully examined and fully considered all the facts presented, respectfully adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions as its own, and earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 416, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1816) granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report thereon:

General Heckman entered the service as major in the Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, was promoted through the several grades to brigadier-general, and commanded a brigade or a division subsequently during the larger part of the war. His military record, as reported by the War Department, is appended hereto.

When the Mexican war broke out General Heckman, then a young man of 24, raised a company and was elected lieutenant, but was afterwards appointed an officer in Company H, First United States Voltigeurs, and took part in all the battles in General Scott's campaign from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico. At the conclusion of the war he made his home in Phillipsburg, N. J., but returned afterwards to Easton, where he became captain of a militia company known as "The National Grays," which became one of the most noted companies in Pennsylvania.

When President Lincoln made his first call for 75,000 men, Captain Heckman took his command to Harrisburg, and it was mustered in as Company D, First Pennsylvania Volunteers.

He afterwards became major of the Ninth New Jersey Regiment and shortly lieutenant-colonel, and led the regiment at the battles of Roanoke Island and Newbern, after which he became colonel. He was appointed a brigadier-general in November, 1862, for signal ability and meritorious services.

General Heckman died on January 24, 1896, having been in ill health for some years, and was in straitened circumstances, so that his widow is left without any support. The General's death was hastened on account of a painful operation he recently underwent for a wound he received in battle. His widow is 66 years of age, and quite unable to provide by her own efforts for her maintenance.

In view of the brilliant record made by General Heckman in two wars, and the almost destitute circumstances of his widow, your committee are unanimously of opinion that the bill should pass, and accordingly report it back to the Senate with a favorable recommendation.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 14, 1895.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 12th instant, received yesterday, addressed to the Adjutant-General of the Army and by him forwarded to this office, to which the subject pertains, in which letter you request to be furnished with the military record of Charles A. Heckman, late brigadier-general of volunteers, for the use of the Senate Committee on Pensions in connection with Senate bill No. 707, I have the honor to inform you that the official records show as follows:

Charles A. Heckman is regarded by this Department as having been mustered into service as major Ninth New Jersey Infantry Volunteers to date September 26, 1861, to serve three years; was mustered in as lieutenant-colonel to date October 8, 1861, and is regarded as having been mustered in as colonel, same regiment, to date February 10, 1862.

He appears to have served with his regiment until December 24, 1862, when he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, to rank from November 29, 1862. He accepted the appointment December 27, 1862; was immediately assigned to the command of a brigade, and continued on duty commensurate with his rank until May 16, 1864, when he was captured at the battle of Drewry Bluff, Va. He remained a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy, being confined at Richmond, Va., Macon, Ga., and Charleston, S. C., respectively, until August 3, 1864, when he was paroled and directed to repair to his home at Phillipsburg, N. J., to await orders.

He was again assigned to duty commensurate with his rank September 17, 1864, and continued on such duty until March 23, 1865, when he was ordered to proceed to his place of residence, thence to report by letter to the Adjutant-General of the Army.

He was honorably discharged the service in special orders from this Department to date May 25, 1865, on tender of resignation.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, U. S. A., Chief Record and Pension Office.

Hon. JOHN M. PALMER,
United States Senate.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BENJAMIN F. YOUNG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2395) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Young, late a private of Company G, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin F. Young, late a private in Company G, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

Mr. ERDMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2395) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Young, late private Company G, First Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, having carefully examined and considered all the facts and circumstances presented, respectfully report as follows:

Benjamin F. Young enlisted September 30, 1861, as private in Company G, First Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, and faithfully served until January 4, 1864, when he reenlisted in same company and was given a veteran forlough for thirty days, but was taken sick at home and was reported "absent sick" on the muster roll of March and April, and afterwards discharged by special order of Department of Ohio, to take effect February 4, 1864.

He applied for pension May 4, 1876, for "rheumatism, from which he has lost his kneecap, some of the bones of his feet and bones of his head." His claim was rejected August 24, 1876, on the ground that his disability was not contracted in line of duty.

He filed a claim under act of June 27, 1890, on July 17, 1890, alleging rheumatism, disease of heart, and scrofula. This was rejected February 27, 1891, on the ground that all disabilities alleged are due to vicious habits.

He appealed to the Secretary of the Interior on both claims, who affirmed the decision of rejection September 6, 1894, saying:

"The preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the view that appellant's disability is due to vicious habits."

Your committee examined all the evidence in the claim and is truly surprised at the unwarranted decision. The testimony of comrades shows he contracted rheumatism in service in Tennessee in November, 1863. His attending physician, Dr. E. B. Fee, of Georgetown, Ohio, testified that he commenced treating him February 16, 1864, and continued treatment until September 23, 1864, and occasionally prescribed for him since; that he "treated him for syphilis and gonorrheal rheumatism, and that he is now suffering (June 12, 1876) from necrosis of the bones of the head and face and other parts of the body."

The same physician filed affidavits September 10, 1880, and April 15, 1882, in both of which he contradicts his former testimony and says his "books" and "notes" say he treated him for "chronic rheumatism." He also wrote a letter to the Commissioner and says his former affidavit was a mistake, and that he made it when he did not have access to his books, and says: "In examining my books I find that I did not treat him for syphilis, but chronic rheumatism," and asks the Commissioner, "Can you not correct the error?"

The board of surgeons at Hillsboro, Ohio, examined him April 2, 1884, and after describing his symptoms say:

"The skin of arms, legs, and hands, as also other parts, the conjunctiva and throat, all indicate to us, as above described, the result of latent syphilis."

Opposed to this, the only testimony tending to show vicious habits and immoral disease, are the sworn affidavits of eleven reputable physicians, who testify that after careful examination they are unable to find any indications that claimant suffered from the immoral disease mentioned, and some of them testify from personal knowledge that he never had it. Dr. R. B. Fee testifies that his father, Dr. E. B. Fee, was mistaken in his first diagnosis and affidavit, and so stated publicly and had made affidavit to that effect; and affiant states most positively that claimant never had the disease referred to. The board of examining surgeons at Georgetown, Ohio, December 18, 1889, say:

"The scaly-skin disease, in our opinion, may be psoriasis and not sequela of syphilis. The differential diagnosis between syphiloderma and psoriasis would incline to psoriasis. The ulcers may have been strumous. The loss of vomer and the blotches could be due to other causes than syphilis. It is quite probable that the disability was incurred in the service, as he claims, and that it has not been prolonged or aggravated by vicious habits."

The testimony shows clearly that applicant was of a scrofulous diathesis, that his mother, two sisters, and four brothers were more or less scrofulous from infancy, and some of them almost blind at times, and (eliminating Dr. E. B. Fee's first affidavit, which he tried to eliminate by two subsequent affidavits and a personal letter) there remains not a scintilla of proof but that claimant's present deplorable condition could arise from rheumatism and scrofula, and your committee believe it did, and that a great injustice has been done this soldier.

We submit as an appendix the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, believing that any fair-minded reader will arrive at our conclusion.

Your committee therefore earnestly recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment, adding, after the word "cavalry," in line 7, the words "and pay him a pension of $30 per month."

APPENDIX.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 6, 1894.

[Docket 21720. Appeal in the pension claim of Benjamin F. Young, Company G, First Ohio Cavalry, No. 218776. Rejection affirmed. The preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the view that appellant's disability is due to vicious habits.]

SIR: Benjamin F. Young was enrolled and mustered into the service on the 30th of September, 1861. He reenlisted January 4, 1864. On the roll for March and April, 1864, he is reported absent sick at Cincinnati, Ohio. A special order directed his discharge to date from February 4, 1864, as he was absent from that date without proper authority.

On the 4th of May, 1876, he filed an application for pension in which he alleged that while in the line of duty in the service he contracted rheumatism from which he had lost his kneecap and some of the bones of his feet and head.

On the 17th of July, 1890, he filed an application for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, in which he alleged disability from rheumatism, disease of the heart, and scrofula. His claim under the act of June 27, 1890, was rejected on the ground that his disability is due to vicious habits. The claim under former laws was rejected in August, 1876, on the ground that the disability was not contracted in the line of duty. From the action rejecting both claims an appeal is taken.

Applicant testified that he could not present the testimony of the regimental surgeon or a commissioned officer of his company, as he could not ascertain the whereabouts of any one of them. He presented the testimony of a member of Company G and two members of Company H, First Ohio Cavalry, with a view to prove that he contracted rheumatism in November, 1863.

Dr. E. B. Fee, of Georgetown, Ohio, testified July 12, 1876, that Benjamin F. Young came under his charge February 16, 1864, and that he had prescribed for him occasionally since that time. Affiant treated him for syphilis and gonorrheal rheumatism. He is now suffering from necrosis of the bones of the head and face and other portions of the body. His disease appears to be steadily marching onward with periods of amelioration and aggravation.

Dr. E. B. Fee, in an affidavit made on the 15th of April, 1882, stated that he knew the applicant from childhood. "After he veteranized he was furloughed and returned home. I was called to see him on the 16th of February, 1864. My notes say that he had gonorrhea and rheumatism. I think the gonorrhea was perhaps produced from continued horseback exercise, thereby bruising the urethra which resulted in urethral discharge. I continued to treat him to September 23, inclusive, during which time he had ostitis of the os frontis, malar bone, humerus, ulna, carpus, metacarpus, and phalanges of both arms and hands. He lost a portion of all these bones and all of some of them. I have treated him occasionally since, of which I have no data, because I considered my treatment gratuitous."

Dr. W. A. Bivins testified, October 7, 1889, that to the best of his recollection he had known Benjamin F. Young since January or February, 1864, at which time he was called to render him medical aid. He was severely afflicted with rheumatism, principally of the large joints, but many of the smaller joints were also affected. He is afflicted with scrofula, for which affiant has given him medicine several times. A very careful examination did not reveal any evidence of syphilis. Affiant can not give dates of treatment, for the reason that he never kept any account against applicant and has to rely altogether on his memory.

Dr. Thomas Robinson testified, November 27, 1888, that about 1869 he treated Benjamin F. Young for some scrofula sores on the scalp and arm. There was nothing of a syphilitic nature about him at that time, or before, or since, that affiant had any knowledge of. He has had rheumatism since 1869, and is yet troubled with the effects of the same, but affiant did not treat him for that disease.

Dr. Robert B. McCall, in his testimony taken October 14, 1889, after describing the scars on the applicant's forehead, on the radial border, and anterior surface of right forearm, and on the right arm at outer border of deltoid muscle, says he is not prepared to state the precise character of the ulceration which produced these lesions.

Dr. M. Stoup testified, December 28, 1891, that he had examined B. F. Young and found him affected with rheumatism and scrofula. He had known him for thirty years and never knew him to be affected with syphilis.

Dr. M. W. Hayes testified, January 5, 1891, that he had examined Benjamin F. Young and found him suffering from scrofula and rheumatism. He found no indication of syphilis.

Dr. J. B. McClain testified, October 2, 1892, that he had on that day examined Benjamin F. Young and found him to be of scrofulous diathesis and laboring under articular rheumatism and disease of the heart. He found nothing to indicate that he ever had syphilis.

Dr. W. J. Snofe testified, October 14, 1892, that he had known Benjamin F. Young more than forty-five years. Said Young is suffering from chronic articular rheumatism and cardiac disease and scrofula. The former diseases resulted from exposure in the Army; the scrofula is hereditary. He was intimately acquainted with said Young when he came from the Army, and knows that he was not affected with syphilis.

Dr. C. H. Mathews testified, May 15, 1893, that he had recently examined Benjamin F. Young and found him suffering from chronic rheumatism, scrofula, and disease of heart. Said Young's disabilities are not the result of vicious habits, but of hard labor and exposure.

Dr. S. Guthrie testified, November 24, 1888, that he had examined claimant and found him afflicted with chronic rheumatism, affecting his whole body. He states that he found no evidence of "any immoral disease."

The board of surgeons at Hillsboro, Ohio, in their certificate of medical examination, made April 2, 1884, state:

"We have very carefully examined this man, and find two small cicatrices on frontal region of scalp, adherent, the bony structure having been involved. Also find a large, depressed, and contracted cicatrix, 3 inches long, 2 inches above the right knee joint, the osseous structure of the femur having been involved in ulceration, leaving some deformity, but no loss of patella, as alleged. We find the metatarsal bone of second toe of right foot has a loss of a portion of bony structure by ulceration, and there is eversion of the large toes of each foot and deformity. He has also cicatrices on each forearm, depressed, adherent, contracted, producing some deformity of wrists and hands. The skin of arms, legs, and hands, as also other parts, the conjunctiva and throat, all indicate to us, as above described, the results of latent syphilis. He acknowledges to us that these sores occurred some several years after his discharge."

The board of surgeons at Georgetown, Ohio, in their certificate of December 18, 1889, describe eschars from abscesses and ulcers on various parts of the body, and copper-colored or liver-brown stains or blotches upon the skin. They say "the vomer is absent." They state:

"Applicant has strumous family history. The scaly skin disease, in our opinion, may be psoriasis and not sequela of syphilis. The differential diagnosis between syphiloderma and psoriasis would incline to psoriasis. The loss of vomer and the blotches could be due to other cause than syphilis."

Dr. E. B. Fee, in a letter to the Commissioner of Pensions, dated December 12, 1883, stated:

"In relation to Benjamin F. Young, a private of Seventh Ohio Volunteer Cavalry. If I said in my affidavit that his disease was gonorrheal rheumatism, I think I was mistaken. My affidavit was made when I did not have access to my books. In examining my books I find that I did not treat him for syphilis, but for chronic rheumatism. My impression is that in my affidavit I said gonorrheal rheumatism. If I did, my memory was at fault, for my books show chronic rheumatism. I have this day examined my books and they say chronic rheumatism, and my treatment was for that disease. If I did him a wrong, can you not correct it?"

The statement in this letter is not sworn to, and is therefore not of sufficient weight to controvert the testimony to which it refers, given more than seven years before.

Under the circumstances of this case, the evidence is not sufficient to show that the disability on account of which pension was claimed was contracted in the line of duty in the service. The preponderance of the evidence is that it is due to vicious habits.

The action rejecting the claim under the act of June 27, 1890, and that under former laws is therefore affirmed.

Very respectfully, JNO. M. REYNOLDS,
Assistant Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table. It is an outrageous bill. I do not care to discuss it. The reading of the report is sufficient to show the character of the bill. I make that motion.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TALBERT, and on a division there were—ayes 10, noes 49.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee). One hundred and ten members are present, a quorum.

So the motion was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of the committee, on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 74, noes 2.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, a quorum being present.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question recurring on the motion to lay aside the bill with a favorable recommendation, on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 72, noes 3.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point, a quorum being present.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CATHARINE HARRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6922) to pension Catharine Harris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Catharine Harris, as the mother of Mathias Harris, late of Company I, Seventeenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, between the words "the" and "mother," insert the word "dependent;" and insert after the word "Infantry," in line 7, the following: "and pay her a pension of $12 per month."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6922) to pension Catharine Harris, submit the following report:

The facts show that the soldier, Mathias Harris, was a private in Company I, Seventeenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, served his time, and was honorably discharged at Columbus, Ohio, with his regiment. He was given Government transportation to his home, and when a few miles out of Columbus on his way home a railroad accident occurred, and he, with another member of the company, was killed and several others injured.

Catharine Harris is the mother of soldier, destitute, and a widow. She is a very old woman, and has no relative upon whom she can depend for support.

The committee are of the opinion that the case comes within the spirit of the pension laws. While the soldier was discharged, he had not yet reached his home and was still to all intents and purposes in service when he was killed.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments, viz:

In line 6, between the words "the" and "mother," insert the word "dependent," and insert after the word "Infantry," in line 7, the following: "and pay her a pension of $12 per month."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know whether this soldier left a widow. Does the gentleman in charge of the bill know whether he left a widow?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I am not able to state more than the report says, but I should like to address the committee later with reference to the merits of this bill.

Mr. KERR. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON], but I reported it from the committee. There is no direct evidence that I recollect on the question raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but this fact appeared in the evidence, that he was a very young man—I think between 19 and 20 years old. He had been in the Army for two or three years before that time, and was killed on his way home. The presumption is that he was not married.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the House for a moment on this bill. It recalls an incident which occurred more than thirty years ago. One of my brothers had just returned from the war, after the declaration of peace. Almost the first thing he said to us was that the pleasure of getting home was greatly marred by a sad accident which had occurred a few miles from the city of Columbus, in which two of his comrades had lost their lives and in which he came very near losing his. He spoke with deep feeling of the brave boys who had been with him through the war, who had followed Sherman to the sea and through the Carolinas, who had taken part in the great, grand review, and who were a part of the mighty hosts who had established the perpetuity of the Union and whose martial tread as they swept down the Avenue had shaken this Capitol, and whose lives went out almost in the shadow of their homes. It was a touching story and impressed me deeply.

Mr. Chairman, the pensioner in this case is the mother of one of those soldiers who lost their lives in that unfortunate accident, almost in the embrace of their loved ones, and when I introduced this bill I thought how strange it was that I should play a part in the tragedy I had heard of so long ago. I hope, sir, this bill will pass this House without a dissenting vote.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recomendation.

EDWARD VUNK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3842) to increase the pension of Edward Vunk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Edward Vunk, formerly a member of Company D, Twelfth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry, to $50 per month, in lieu of the pension now paid him; said increase to take effect on and after March 1, 1896.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 6, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-five," and strike out all after the word "him" in line 7.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ZOLMAN TYRRELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4539) granting a pension to Zolman Tyrrell, imbecile son of Lewis R. Tyrrell, late Company A, First New York Engineers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Zolman Tyrrell, imbecile son of Lewis R. Tyrrell, late Company A, First New York Engineers, on the pension roll and pay him a pension of $50 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 5, strike out the word "imbecile" and insert in lieu thereof the word "idiotic."

In line 7, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Add, after the word "month," in line 7, the words "to be paid to a duly appointed guardian."

Strike out section 2.

Strike out all of the title after the word "Tyrrell."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to amend the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would be in order.

Mr. RAY. Under the laws of the State of New York, idiots, instead of having guardians to take care of their estates, have what we call committees, and I therefore move to insert, after the word "guardian," in the amendment to line 8, the words "or committee."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, after the word "guardian," add the words "or committee."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] is recognized and asks for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4539) granting a pension to Zolman Tyrrell, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Lewis R. Tyrrell, father of the beneficiary of this bill, served from September 1, 1864, to July 3, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. He applied for pension and was pensioned under the general law for hemorrhoids following typhoid fever, and was receiving $12 per month in 1894, when he died, leaving neither widow nor minor child. It is probable that his death was due to causes arising in the service, though it is not shown; and no one has pensionable status under existing law on account of his service.
